Summary: Plant workers and firefighters put their lives on the line to control a catastrophic April 1986 explosion at a Soviet nuclear power plant.

it seems a car is outside, spying on him. When Legaslov returns to his apartment, he feeds his cat, then hangs himself.

Not far from the Chernobyl plant, Lyudmilla and fireman Vasily Ignatenko hear and see the plant explosion from their home. Meanwhile, at Chernobyl, we get an inkling as to why Legaslov bad-mouthed Dyatlov earlier. Right from the outset, Dyatlov denies the possibility of a core explosion, blaming Toptunov for blowing up the control tank and downplaying the disaster. Still, Perevozchenko insists the core is no longer there. However, Dyatlov doesn't appear to be so bad, at least not yet. Similarly, Vasily the fireman downplays the explosion, confidently getting ready to face the danger.

However, at the facility itself, people are already vomiting blood, and a man named Khodemchuk is missing (apparently they never find him, at least not in this episode). Another man, Viktor is bloody — often a sign things aren't going well. Despite how the air tastes like metal, Dyatlov still denies there was a core explosion and acts like things are okay. However, the firefighters, nuclear plant workers, and bloody sores begin to tell another story.

Perevozschenko says this, meaning to say there was no core there! However, when assessing the problem, including the injuries around him, Dyatlov tells Akimov that he's seen worse. On that note, Akimov is told to call in the day shift, to help assist in the situation. Meanwhile, we learn that the nearest hospital doesn't have iodine pills — although, realistically, such pills offer only minimal protection against radiation, at best.

When assessing what happened, Chief Engineer Nikolai Fomin and Director Bryukhanov are told that hydrogen accumulated in a control system tank and ignited. However, Dyatlov still denies a core explosion possibility. Then, in perhaps the bleakest scene of the episode, we see nuclear dust particles in the air, and children playing in it! While this fun is happening, Vasily and other firefighters are directed to address the fire from the roof.

As power plant workers head into the non-existent core, those in charge hold a meeting. Director Bryukhanov says the accident is "well under control." However, Petrovich says radiation is not limited to the plant itself and notes that "the air is glowing." However, in a rousing speech, Zharkov urges the committee to seal off the city, so no one leaves and to "cut off the spread of misinformation." Afterward, Dyatlov vomits from radiation exposure. Meanwhile, Sitnikov is sent to look at the core from the vent block roof. He initially refuses, but ultimately goes and sees the disaster for what it is.

As truck after truck bring people to the hospital, Valery Legasov gets called in to attend a meeting, to give answers about RBMK reactor questions. However, Boris Shcherbina makes clear that Legasov is only to answer technical questions, and it's implied that the range of acceptable topics and answers will be limited. The episode ends with an encroaching, ominous cloud, then a crow falling dead from the sky.

Summary: With untold millions at risk, Ulana makes a desperate attempt to reach Valery and warn him about the threat of a second explosion.

At the Belorussian Institute for Nuclear energy in Minsk, Dmitri and Ulana Khomyuk immediately analyze a sample of a substance in the air. Although Ulana is a composite character, she adequately represents the struggle of Russian nuclear scientists to break through bureaucratic red tape to expose the simple truths of the Chernobyl disaster.

Both Ulana and Legasov ultimately take it upon themselves to prove that Chernobyl's core actually exploded, whereas the Soviet authorities are officially denying it. However, when no one's answering the phone at the plant, it almost immediately validates certain concerns about the disaster's scope.

Hospitals have already seen the explosion's effects. Dr. Svetlana Zinchenko is dealing with a patient's radiation burns and contaminated clothes. Shockingly, no one on the hospital staff seems to be wearing gloves as they handle nuclear-contaminated clothing!

Because of the panic (and radioactive particles) in the air, Lyudmilla Ignatenko easily sneaks into the crowded hospital to find her firefighter husband, Vasily. She is told that he was transported to Moscow, and to tell them that Major Burov allows her there. However, will that be enough to get her through a blockade?

Legasov soon meets with officials, including Mikhail Gorbachev, the General Secretary of the CPSU. Shcherbina is largely downplaying the disaster. However, Legasov notes how graphite on the ground means the core exploded, adding that dosimeter readings are inaccurate — they are only low because they've maxed out with those particular dosimeters. In other words, the radiation is much higher than a chest x-ray.

When accused of exaggerating, Legasov says, "It's not alarmist if it's a fact." When asked about the RBMK reactor, he compares every gram of U-235 to bullet. While the bullets may not always kill instantly, they have potentially highly lethal effects.

Gorbachev tasks Shcherbina and Legasov with examining the facility, and they travel by helicopter to the Chernobyl plant. On the way there, Shcherbina threatens Legasov to gain information on the technology, saying, "Tell me how a nuclear reactor works or I'll have one of these soldiers throw you out of the helicopter." Legasov explains that it makes electricity with steam, as the steam turns a turbine. The aforementioned graphite surrounds fuel rods to slow down neutron flux.

He also has Shcherbina look out the window to see radiation ionizing the air, to demonstrate firsthand that the core is exposed. Bizarrely, in wanting a closer look, Shcherbina threatens to have the pilot shot if he doesn't fly over reactor! Legasov boldly oversteps the threat, telling the pilot: "If you fly directly over that core, I promise you, by tomorrow morning you'll be begging for that bullet."

At the Belorussian Communist Party headquarters, Ulana meets deputy secretary Garanin. He initially resists her information, which prompts her to say, "I'm a nuclear physicist. Before you were deputy secretary you worked in a shoe factory." On her way out, she gives him iodine tablets, advising her to get as far from Minsk as she can. The downplaying continues for Legasov, too.

Chernobyl manager Viktor Bryukhanov dismisses Legasov as "saying dangerous things," and discredits him for not explaining how the RBMK core exploded. Bryukhanov even calls it disgraceful.

However, the supposedly disgraced Legasov gets his high range dosimeters. It's quickly assessed that, as they put men in vehicles for their plan, some lead shielding may not be enough. General Pikalov says the dosimeter readings are at 15,000 roentgen, which is obviously far higher than 3!

To emphasize what that means, Legasov says the fire's giving off nearly twice the radiation released by Hiroshima bomb. He adds that it's not a normal fire. If you try to put it out with water, heat will instantly vaporize it. He emphasizes, "You are dealing with something that has never occurred on this planet before."

As a tentative plan, he suggests using 5,000 tons of sand and boron and evacuating the city of Pripyat. Later, at a bar, a local woman asks Legasov if there's anything to worry about. Legasov lies to her, simply saying "No." It may be a pivotal moment for the character, but one easily understands why he told her that.

By this point, even Shcherbina seems to see the gravity of the situation. He was seemingly moved by the problems faced by children. So, this time at least, he actually orders helicopters to not fly directly over the core. Still, one gets too close and crashes. As this plan is enacted, Ulana calls Marina, and they speak in code to verify the boron drop (presumably to avoid detection by Soviet officials). However, we soon learn government secrecy isn't working anyway. Germans are already reluctant to let their children play outside!

Ulana soon meets Boris and Legasov by getting arrested and tells them that sand and boron is a mistake. Legasov initially didn't know that water was gushing into Chernobyl's structure the whole time. What does that mean? Well, as Legasov explains before Gorbachev and crew: The temperature will rise because of the sand, and the uranium will melt the sand, creating lava.

Then, when the lava enters the water tanks, it is certain to cause a thermal explosion, destroying everything within 30 kilometers (approximately 18.64 miles).

In order to avoid mass devastation, cancer, and birth defects, someone must pump water from these tanks. They need three workers to get through to the "sluice gate" valve to pump them out. The major downside to this challenge? The three men will likely die in a week. In an actual inspiring moment from Boris Shcherbina, he explains to a disgruntled plant employee that, "If you don't do this, millions will die." While one can understand asking "What's in it for us?" there really is more at stake here than one person's benefit.

At this point, it ceases being an ideological matter, but one of decency and bravery. While not everyone can rise to that challenge, Ananenko, Bezplov and Baranov volunteer. Little time is wasted in getting them to the plant. As they traverse the waters, their dosimeters going off like crazy. Ominously, their flashlight goes out.

Summary: Valery creates a detailed plan to decontaminate Chernobyl; Lyudmilla ignores warnings about her firefighter husband's contamination.

The basement is successfully drained, but a nuclear meltdown has begun and threatens to contaminate the groundwater.

Shcherbina and Legasov convince Gorbachev that a heat exchanger is needed under the plant, for which Mikhail Shchadov recruits from Tula coal miners, led by Glukhov, to excavate a tunnel in extremely adverse conditions.

Shcherbina warns Legasov that they are under KGB surveillance.

Legasov sends Khomyuk to a Moscow hospital, where she finds Dyatlov uncooperative but learns from dying Toptunov and Akimov that the plant exploded after Akimov initiated an emergency shutdown, a scenario thought impossible.

Bribing her way into the hospital and lying about her pregnancy, Lyudmilla is allowed to visit Vasily but disobeys orders, staying longer and touching her husband.

Following Vasily's death, Khomyuk finds Lyudmilla; aware of Lyudmilla's pregnancy, she threatens to report everything to the committee and is arrested by KGB agents, but is released on Legasov's insistence.

As Shcherbina and Legasov report to the Central Executive Committee their decontamination plans requiring the mass mobilization of liquidators, Lyudmilla stands among relatives of other deceased ARS victims as Vasily, sealed in a lead casket, is buried in concrete at a mass grave.

Summary: Valery and Boris attempt to find solutions to removing the radioactive debris; Ulana attempts to find out the cause of the explosion.

Residents are evacuated from the wider Chernobyl Exclusion Zone and decontamination operations are underway.

Civilian draftee Pavel is paired with Soviet—Afghan War veteran Bacho to patrol the Zone to shoot and dispose of abandoned animals due to radioactive contamination.

Chernobyl liquidator commander General Nikolai Tarakanov deploys Lunokhod programme rovers to clear the plant's roof for a shelter.

After a West German police robot almost instantly fails on the most irradiated level, Tarakanov is forced to cycle 3,828 liquidators to clear it by hand, allowed only 90 seconds each, once.

Khomyuk investigates the Moscow archives and confronts Dyatlov, who knows the government is not interested in the truth.

Meeting away from KGB bugs, Shcherbina and Legasov inform Khomyuk they must testify as experts in the trial of Dyatlov, Bryukhanov, and Fomin, and Legasov will address the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Khomyuk reveals an article about an identical incident at the Leningrad Nuclear Power Plant in 1975, suppressed by the KGB, and tells them Lyudmilla gave birth to a girl who soon died from radiation poisoning.

Khomyuk urges Legasov to tell the IAEA the complete truth, while Shcherbina urges caution to avoid government retaliation.

Summary: Valery, Boris and Ulana risk their lives and reputations to expose the truth about Chernobyl.

Following Legasov's testimony to the IAEA in Vienna, in which he lies, Dyatlov, Bryukhanov, and Fomin are put on trial in the abandoned city of Chernobyl.

Shcherbina is called first to give testimony, explaining the general workings of a nuclear power plant.

Khomyuk and Legasov testify on the events leading up to the accident, based on interviews with people in the control room.

Flashbacks show that due to a ten-hour delay in the safety test and Dyatlov's impatience to carry it out, the reactor stalled, then experienced a power spike. Akimov activated the emergency shutdown, but a design flaw in the control rods spiked the power to ten times the reactor's limit before it exploded.

Legasov reveals the suppressed information about the Leningrad plant, admitting he lied in his previous testimony in Vienna. He is detained by the KGB and informed that his testimony will be suppressed in the state media; furthermore, he is forbidden to speak to anyone about Chernobyl, he will receive no credit for his role in containing the disaster, and he will never work again.

The ending shows pictures and video of the real Legasov and other major players, revealing their fates, as well as the ongoing aftermath of the accident.
