Summary:	Rosewood (or Rosie to friends) is asked by his mother to investigate the suspicious death of one of her top students, since the police can't find any evidence of foul play.

Dr. Rosewood is a Private Pathology Consultant and what that means is that he is not the actual coroner. He's more the guy they call when it gets too busy down at the coroner's office. Yet, despite his lack of a badge or official standing, Rosewood does like to stick his nose into police business.

Call it curiosity if you will but so far he's managed to tick off more than a few people by providing evidence that completely obliterates their theories. So the police department does occasionally find him to be a nuisance but the one thing that everyone can agree on is that Rosewood is talented.

He sees what many dismiss. And he's usually never wrong. So when his mother came to him about a former student of hers — she wanted to know if she and the recently deceased's family were right to suspect foul play.

Nora Grayson was a talented young woman and sadly she died in an apparent car crash. Yet Nora didn't like driving. People that knew had have even said that it put her on edge. Thus, with her being known as that skittish, why did the official report on her death claim she was doing over 90 mph on a highway?

It simply did not make sense and that's why Rosewood's mother alerted her son to the case. She asked him to look into it and he did so at first as a favor to her but then he too began having doubts about how she died. So he approached the new detective that had closed Nora's file and, regardless of their chemistry, he had to convince her that she was wrong with her initial assessment.

If he hadn't then she would never have reopened the case.

But getting Detective Annalise Villa to admit she was wrong was a quite battle. And then getting her to accept him as a partner was just one fight after another. Villa didn't want a partner and she in fact appeared to loathe the idea of one.

So working together was a headache. Villa didn't like Rosewood's methods and he didn't need her to be always the bad cop. That routine of hers got them nowhere. And it also broke a suspect's nose.

Rosewood was able to fix that nose but Villa was soon upset with him again after he cleared their only suspect. Nora's boyfriend had been drinking a lot on the night that Nora died. Plus he was allegedly angry with her for cheating on him so Villa would have been happy to say that the boyfriend was their killer. Yet Rosewood proved to her and funnily enough to the boyfriend as well that said boyfriend was drugged on the night in question.

Back at his office, Rosewood's sister and future sister-in-law had done their thing with the toxicology reports and they found evidence of someone using horse tranquilizer on Nora right before she died. So that meant whoever killed her by first drugging her and then planting a block of dry ice under her foot so that it appeared she was driving — went into great detail just to kill her. Almost as if they have experience with that sort of thing.

And when Rosewood's sister Pippy found something else in the toxology that too led to more information on their killer.

Evidence was found that proved Nora had been frequently taking motion sickness drugs and that means she was constantly on a boat. Later the strict records at the marina told the detective which boat she was visiting. But when a found a boat and a matching suspect — they walked in on an apparent suicide. It looked like Arthur Briggs had killed himself and that he also wasn't concerned about leaving his packages of drugs just lying around anymore.

Villa found bags upon bags of this new thing called black cocaine. So her boss wanted to tie up the case right then and there. And he probably would have if it weren't for Villa. Arthur being a drug dealer that killed Nora in order to keep her from talking was simply too neat. Especially as Arthur's boat has not moved in the last two years thereby disproving that theory.

So while they were able to connect Arthur to Nora, Villa knew that neither of them had been using Arthur's boat to distribute anything.

Though calling upon one of Rosewood's many friends proved to be invaluable. Joo-Joo was heavy on the part circuit and he knew Arthur. Which showed that Arthur involved with a drug trade. And that the entire case was someone tidying up after themselves.

Joo-Joo told Villa, under a lot of "persuasion" that Arthur and Nora both worked on a DJ Prince's yacht. Nora was a hostess and Arthur drove the yacht itself. But Arthur was also a distributor. So DJ Prince's yacht was a front.

On the outside, it looked like the perfect place to party but on the inside the DJ was caught up with the cartel.

And though he was good at getting rid of people, he wasn't smart enough not to confess on video when he was up against both Villa and Rosewood. So, in the end, Villa finally admitted that she and Rosewood do make a good team.

And who knows, after she's finished mourning her husband's sudden death from a pulmonary embolism, Villa might just see Rosewood as something more.

Summary: A shocking piece of evidence surfaces during the investigation of a serious crime involving a wealthy Miami man. Meanwhile, Rosewood's romantic pursuits clash with his mother's demands; and Villa encounters trouble on the job.

The episode kicks off with Beaumont on a hot and steamy date, he takes her home and after a hot makeout session — he informs her that he thinks they should wait to have sex. She is obviously shocked, but heads to bed ... alone.

The next morning on the beach a little boy is playing in the sand and finds what appears to be a severed foot — the foot is sticking up out of the ground. Rosewood is busy cooking breakfast and he receives a phone call from the precinct. He rushes there — the Captain thinks that he is having a heart attack. Rosewood tells him that he isn't having a heart attack, but he will soon if he doesn't reduce some of the stress in his work and at home with his 7 kids. Rosewood wants him to meditate with him.

A call comes in for the foot found on the beach, Captain Hornstock and Villa rush to the scene. Rosewood overhears the call and shows up at the beach too — even though the cops told him not to. The Captain caves and lets him examine the severed foot. He says that there are small bite marks on the foot — they think that a dog chewed the foot off the body and left it on the beach. There are also fire scars on the leg, Captain tells Rosewood he has an hour to work his magic and ID the foot.

Beaumont's mom Lorraine shows up at the lab — she is upset because he keeps skipping family movie night. She wants him to bring his new girlfriend to Sunday night dinner. Pippy and TMI are busy singing "Moulin Rouge," Rosewood gets rid of his mother and tells them that it is time to get to work. They search for prints on the severed foot, and start getting to work ID'ing the body that the foot belongs. Rosewood finds a hair on the foot and rushes it for a DNA test.

At the precinct, Hornstock calls Villa in to his office. He tells her that he needs to take time off and see a therapist. She just lost her husband, and she is obviously not coping with it well. She got in a fight at the bar a night before — and she still has cuts on her hand. Rosewood interrupts their meeting, he says that he has a fingerprint off the foot and he dropped it off at the lab — they will have the owner's name in an hour. And, he also brought a two week supply of his "home brew" to help Hornstock relax and alleviate some of his stress.

Villa leaves work and heads to a bar, Rosewood follows her. He joins her for a drink and she explains that she grew up there, it reminds her of her father. Rosewood tries to get her to come to church with him, but she isn't interested. He knows that she has been living at a motel, and he is worried about her. Villa snaps that he needs to focus on his own personal life, he is almost 40 years old and he still isn't married and hasn't settled down with one girl.

Villa receives a phone call from the lab, they got a match back on the fingerprint on the foot — it belongs to a woman named Chiang Wen. Villa and Rosewood track down Chiang Wen and show her a picture of the foot. She explains that she just gave him a pedicure, that's why her prints were on the foot. They had back to the precinct and ID the owner of the foot as Marty Conforth — he co-owns a match-making company for rich people.

They bring Marty's wife Carrie in for questioning, she says she was at her summer home in the Keys when he was killed, and she was snorkeling — her housekeeper can verify that. Villa informs Carrie that Marty was engaged to another woman named Beth. Carrie is shocked, she insists that her marriage with Marty was perfect. Hornstock takes Beth in for interrogation, she says that she was at her condo the night that Marty was killed. Villa is certain that the wife Carrie is the killer, but Hornstock thinks that it was his fiancée Beth.

Villa heads to Platinum Mates, the company that Marty owned. Rosewood tags along and they go to a mixer that the company set up for rich people to meet up. They meet Marty's business partner Judy. Judy says that Marty "loved women," and he met Beth at a mixer. Judy thinks that Beth was in love with Marty, and she never would have killed him. She says that Carrie is the one that they should be looking in to.

After the mixer, Rosewood stops by his mom's house for a surprise visit. She whines about him not bringing his new girlfriend. The talk turns to him not settling down, Rosewood reveals to his mom that he took his name off the heart transplant list. He knew that the odds of his body rejecting a new heart were high, and he didn't want to waste a heart on another patient who wouldn't reject it. Donna is furious, she tells Rosewood that she "can't even look at him right now."

Rosewood heads back to the lab and dives in to his work, he runs a test on a rash on the foot — he tells TMI and Pippy that the rash is from poisonwood, which is a rare plant. The girls analyze a rug hair on the foot and trace it back to a hotel — they call Villa and give her the address of the hotel. Rosewood rushes to the police station and is mad that Villa beat him to the hotel. She says that she talked to the clerk and Marty checked in there the night that she died.

Villa receives a frantic phone call from Marty's wife Carrie — she was just in a car accident. While she is in the ambulance she tells Villa and Rosewood that somebody sabotaged her car. Villa takes a look at Carrie's car, she is telling the truth, someone cut the power steering line and caused the accident. Carrie says that she and Marty are the only people who drive the car — but last weekend he let his partner Judy borrow the car.

Villa and Rosewood head to Platinum Mates to talk to Judy, she confirms that she borrowed the car. Villa checks with the hotel and they confirm that Judy has checked in there with Marty in the past. Villa is certain that Judy is Marty's killer and she sabotaged the car. Rosewood doesn't buy it, Judy has been crying for two days. Villa gets a phone call, they found Marty's body on the beach. Villa and Rosewood arrive, and there isn't a body, just a pile of severed arms and legs. It looks like the killer used an automatic saw. Rosewood rushes the body parts back to the lab. Pippy corners him, she knows he took his name off the donor list. She lectures her brother about getting back on the list so he can get a new heart.

Rosewood gets a break in the case, he rushes to Hornstock's office. He says that according to his autopsy, Marty was killed a week ago — not a few days ago. Villa rushes in, she pulled surveillance tapes from the hardware store and they caught a "crazy bitch" buying trashbags and the saw that was used to hack up Marty's body. Rosewood and Villa's evidence all points to Marty's fiancé Beth. They rush to Beth's house, and she is trying to leave town — and Carrie is in the car with her. Marty was leaving both of them, so that he could be with Judy. Beth tries to make a run for it and drives off, but Beth shoots the car's radiator and ruins their getaway. Police are able to pick them up and arrest both of them about a mile down the road.

After work, Rosewood heads to his mom's house for movie night as promised — and his girlfriend is a no-show, he says she cancelled because of work. He sits down to have Sunday dinner with his mom, Pippy, and TMI.

Elsewhere, Rosewood deals with a new adversary, escalating health problems and a budding romance, while Villa's poor social skills get in the way of solving a case.

The episode kicks off with Dr. Rosewood on the beach for his morning workout, enjoying the sunrise. Meanwhile, in a mansion — a man falls over the balcony on to his livingroom floor and appears to be dead. A man races out of the house after he checks on the body on the floor and hops in his care and leaves. Rosewood is at brunch with his girlfriend — her phone goes off and she says she has to leave, one of her patients has an emergency.

Hornstock and Villa are waiting at the airport for a shuttle driver to return — it's the guy that just left the dead man's house. When he pulls up, they arrest him and take him in to custody for murdering Albert Page. Meanwhile, Rosewood stops by the morgue and gives Max tickets to the opera and checks out the dead body. He mentions to Max that it looks like the victim might have been dead before he dropped 18 feet.

Hornstock has the killer in the interrogation room — he insists that he was innocent and he was "trying to help that dude." Hornstock is certain that he is guilty, he has an eye twitch and dry mouth — so Rosewood says that he is scared to death and innocent. Rosewood takes Hornstock aside and says that he wants to work the case, he even agrees to do it for free.

Rosewood stop by his mom's office to look at her old yearbooks, apparently the suspect Dante was one of her students when he was in foster care — before he dropped out of school. Afterwards, he heads to the crime scene where Villa is working. They come to the conclusion that the victim was already dead before he hit the floor because there is no blood spatter.

Villa heads to therapy, with Rosewood's girlfriend. They talk about her co-workers, and Villa tells her about how frustrated she gets when she has to work with Rosewood. But she doesn't say his name. Villa points out that she is wearing a wedding ring, and she must be cheating on her husband. Rosewood's girlfriend reveals that her and her husband are separated, because she can't get pregnant and have kids.

At the lab, Pippy and TMI are working on Albert Page's body. His sister Pippy teases him about his girlfriend, apparently she and TMI have been gambling on his sex life. Rosewood tells them to get to work. Pippy realizes that Rosewood has been running tests on his own blood again — and his bones are decalcifying. Rosewood looks at Albert's body and realizes that it is covered in red blotches, he runs out of the lab.

Rosewood visits Dante in his prison cell, he says that he knows that he was just performing CPR on Albert and he was telling the truth. Dante says that he just wanted to "see what it was like to live like Albert for one night." Apparently he was sleeping in his house while he was away. Rosewood finds a picture in Dante's cell — he is an artist, and he drew a picture of the beach looking out from Albert's house. Dante snaps at Rosewood that just because they are black doesn't mean that they are the same person.

Back at the lab, Pippy and TMI have a breakthrough, they realize that Albert was poisoned — with antifreeze. It will make you seem drunk, but you are actually slowly dying from the poison. Rosewood remembers that Dante was acting like he was on drugs in his prison cell. He runs and gets Hornstock and they race to Dante's cell to check on him — but he is unconscious. Apparently, he was poisoned with the antifreeze too. They get Dante to the hospital in time and are able to save him.

After Dante is patched up, Rosewood takes him to Albert's house. He shows him what he drank out of the refrigerator. While they are checking out the house, Villa finds footprints in the backyard. Whoever the print belongs to is the guy that broke in to the sliding glass door. While Villa and Rosewood are outback bickering — someone fires shots at them and then runs off.

They had back to the precinct and call their informant Joo Joo — they think he might be able to help them with Albert's car — they noticed that it is full of fake Lambrighini parts. Joo Joo looks at the fake car parts, Joo Joo admits that he has a nephew named Delroy Ellis who sells counterfeit car parts. Villa gets a warrant for Ellis. Meanwhile, Rosewood doesn't want to wait for the judge to sign the warrant — so he pays Ellis a visit at his car lot. He convinces Ellis to take one of the cars for a spin and he gets his shoe print off from the gas pedal. While Rosewood and Ellis are in the car, Rosewood reveals to Ellis that he knows that he killed Albert Page.

Villa arrives at the car lot, Ellis and Rosewood are nowhere to be saw. Athlete Chris Bosh rolls up to the dealership with his Ferrari, Villa takes his car and starts racing down the highway to catch up to Rosewood and Ellis. Villa catches up to them and cuts them off — she arrests Ellis for Albert's murder. Afterwards, Villa invites Rosewood out for a slice of pie, it gets super awkward, and he turns her down and says that he has to go to a family dinner — he takes Dante along to meet his mother.

Summary: When Rosewood and Villa suspect a brilliant doctor has killed two of his patients, they must find a way to make their case with limited evidence. Meanwhile, Villa spars with Captain Hornstock when he discourages her from pursuing an uncertain case. Also, Rosewood receives an anonymous letter revealing something that could change his life forever.

Stephen Stavros was the son of a prominent Miami family. Yet he was spotted being belligerent coming out of a club on the night he died. So Miami PD doesn't want to touch this case. They don't want to be the ones to tell the late Stavros's father, a very important man and one they can't afford to upset, that his son died from an overdose.

Thus the captain decided to hand the autopsy over to Rosewood and he even assigned Villa to oversee the case. Villa is a talented detective but no one really likes. Nor do they want to necessarily get assigned as the same case as her. So the captain figured Rosewood would be great for her. He could be a partner and not actually a partner all at the same time.

And Rosewood and his associates found something odd in Stavros's autopsy. They found out it wasn't a drug overdose that killed the man. Rather it was sulfur in combination with an acupuncture treatment. Though no cardiologist would have ever taken such a risk.

But Stavros had been telling people prior to his death that he was no longer Dr. Foster's patient. Which Foster denied during his initial interview with Villa and Rosewood. So Villa looked into their relationship and she found out that her victim had been looking at lawyers in a possibly malpractice suit.

So she thought Foster was her guy and Rosewood appeared to have that same idea. He hadn't liked the way Foster described his patient almost as if he hated the younger man who did used to do drugs. Stavros was in fact big on the party city however Foster was in charge of fixing him up afterwards. And Rosewood felt their oaths as doctors should have been enough for Foster to treat Stavros with respect even in death.

Only neither Rosewood nor Villa were given the chance to look into Foster properly. Stavros's father pull the plug on their investigation when he asked the captain to stop harassing the family doctor and then made it known that he wanted to bury his son as soon as possible. So the Stavros family didn't want anyone digging deeper into what happened to their son who they felt was an addict that would have died anyway. And the father wasn't afraid to publicly shame the captain if their little talk wasn't enough.

So Villa was caged in and more she tried to fight it — the closer she got to losing her job. Not even her captain would defend her and for a second it looked Foster was going to get away with everything he did. Which at the time could have meant the murder of Stavros and another patient as well.

Stavros turned out not to be the only one that died right before they filed a lawsuit for malpractice.

And in amidst of the investigation, Rosewood was having a personal crisis. An ex-girlfriend had written him to say that she had his kid and that the same kid was one vandalizing all of his billboards. However, after panicking for a few day, it turns out the ex just wanted him to think about kids because earlier he said he wasn't ready. And if he suddenly had kids on the brain now then she was going to worm her way back into his life.

In other words the woman was crazy. Though for a short amount of time she did give Rosewood's mother the hope of a grandchild. The older woman had retired and she didn't how to spend the rest of her says. Rosewood hired her part-time to come work at the lab and ultimately he figure out a way to catch Foster in the act.

Foster was a good doctor but so was Rosewood. Thus Rosewood went to him to check out his heart and he merely pretended to take the medication that Foster offered. And then when he was pretending to be ill, he watched as Foster intentionally drugged him with something that would have killed him and made it look like a heart attack.

But what Foster didn't know was that Villa and officers were waiting right outside the door and heard everything he said. That they could then use to explain Stavros's death as well as getting a warrant to exhume the body of his other victim. So Foster sunk himself and Rosewood had nearly killed himself in order to get the other man to that point.

Yet he said it was all worth it to remove Foster from his position of power.

And as for Villa, she could have taken all the credit with the Stavros family but she didn't. Instead she told them that it was her captain that was at the heart of their investigation even though the captain would have been the first to throw her under the bus.

So Villa took the high road and it looks like she's getting better at making friends. She and Rosewood have developed their own circle of trust and she congratulated him on giving his new girlfriend room in his closet.

Summary: Rosewood and Villa try to make sure a murdered ex-con who's linked to a Little Haiti gang has not died in vain. Meanwhile, Villa is troubled by her dreams; and Rosewood's relationship with Kat takes a surprising turn.

Things have begun to change in Villa and Rosewood's relationship. Before they were just partners, but now it looks like they're becoming friends. And surprisingly that's a problem on tonight's episode of "Rosewood".

Villa you see has started having certain dreams about Rosewood and so usually she waked up disgusted with herself. And tends to be disgusted with Rosewood when she sees the man in person after these dreams. Though that's a problem she's simply going to have to get over. Especially as there aren't a lot of people willing to partner up with her.

Remember, no one in Villa's squad actually likes her. So that only leaves Rosewood and latest victim really did need his help. A former convict who until recently was the youngest woman in Florida to ever be given a life-sentence had had that same sentence commuted. However she was barely free and walking when she was murdered. So a friend of hers and her former lawyer, Trevor McCown, has been creating something of a storm at police headquarters demanding that her case be given the level of respect as any other homicide.

It seems that prior to his intervention, Lavetta's case was being treated as an NHI. No Humans Involved. So once he got Villa to take the case, he then turned to Rosewood to perform the autopsy. He said he didn't trust the Medical Examiner to get to Lavetta's case in a timely fashion.

Yet Villa also had a few questions of her own about McCown. Lavetta had gone to prison because a botched robbery as part of gang initiation had killed McCown's father. So Villa didn't understand why McCown would grow up and come to defend his father's murderer? That just didn't make sense to her and his reasoning that Lavetta had rehabilitated didn't seem plausible.

Villa didn't think McCown could honestly forgive and she wasn't buying the story that Lavetta had changed her life around. So that's how she viewed the case. She went in being pessimistic and she wanted to find evidence that Lavetta had rejoined her old gang. Therefore she was thrilled to find gang paraphernalia at Lavetta's place.

But Lavetta hadn't had those things in her home for herself. There were things she had taken off of younger girls in the neighborhood. Girls she helped because she stopped them from getting recruited into gang themselves.

The sorry story came out after Villa talked and then beat up a woman named Double-Tap. Double-Tap was the leader of Lavetta's old gang and she admitted to wanting Lavetta back. However Lavetta turned her down and Double-Tap respected her wishes.

Yet this other gang in the neighborhood didn't live by a code. So they grew upset and began threatening Lavetta when she stopped several girls from getting recruited. And the last straw for them was Tiana Denard. Tiana was about to be initiated into this new gang that just happened to be run by her sister.

Thus it was the sister that killed Lavetta though for a while Villa had her doubts about McCown. McCown had been in love with Lavetta and she didn't return his feelings. So for a second Villa thought unwanted feelings was what caused him to snap.

But funnily enough it was Villa that had snapped once she found out Rosewood had been dating her therapist.

Nevermind that Kat had tried to break up with Rosewood after Villa let on who she was dreaming about. Or that Rosewood later got the picture and accepted their break-up. What mattered to Villa was that she walked in on them kissing and immediately began to think they had been laughing at her this whole time.

So she told Rosewood to go to hell, she fired her therapist, and then she ran out. And after she did that, Kat told Rosewood he should go after her because she thinks Rosewood might have feelings for Villa as well.

Summary: Capt. Hornstock is a murder suspect when his one of his three ex-wives is killed, so he turns to Rosewood and Villa to help him clear his name. Meanwhile, Villa wants nothing to do with Rosie after her discovery of the relationship between him and her therapist.

The body of Captain Hornstock's third ex-wife Janice was found one morning. So it was only natural that Hornstock came under suspicion.

Yet Villa had believed her captain when he said he didn't do it nor that he had anything to hide right up until an Agent Foito from Internal Affairs arrived on the scene. The agent had asked the captain several questions about the night before including if he had any disagreements with Janice and Hornstock was able to answer every one of those questions in a way that made him look like he was at ease. And so Villa felt put off as she was watching the interrogation. She knew for a fact that Hornstock hated small talk and that he had been stressed before Foitio showed up.

So that in turn made her question why her Captain had readily prepared his answers before Internal Affairs could send someone. And unfortunately she was only left with one answer to explain what she had seen. Hornstock must be hiding something.

Although, neither Rosewood nor Villa actually believed that Hornstock would do anything that would have harmed Janice. They both knew him on a personal level outside of work and he had never come across as that kind of man. Plus he had purposely brought in Rosewood on the case because he felt Rosie was the best man to handle the autopsy. So that just didn't sound like someone that was guilty.

Only Hornstock did lie to Internal Affairs and Villa and Rosewood had figured out what he was hiding. Apparently Hornstock had seen his wife on the day she died. She had to gone to the track to get some money out of him and the two wounded up having a fight. So Hornstock knew how that would look and that's why he tried to lie.

But Internal Affairs had a little bit more on him than mere video from the horse track. They had run ballistics on his gun and it came back as their murder weapon. So they arrested Hornstock truly believing that he would be stupid to hand over the murder weapon and they were willing to stop their investigation right there.

And thankfully not everyone shared their stance. Rosewood continued to study the case and in order to gain access to the body that had been taken to the Medical Examiner's officer — he knew he had to make peace with Villa. Villa was still holding a grudge because she found out he had been dating her psychiatrist but Rosewood was someone that refused to be ignored. So eventually he wore her down and snuck him in to see the body.

So Rosewood found out the victim had been shot by a distinctive bullet. And it was that bullet that finally proved someone had been setting Hornstock up.

See, Hornstock was many things but Internal Affairs were seriously doubting his intelligence when there was no way he could have risen to his position without some smarts. So Rosewood and Villa presented them with evidence. They showed the bullet had been shot at the very same spot that Hornstock likes to visit for private shooting. And then they pointed out to internal affairs that Hornstock wouldn't have shot his ex-wife at his own sanctuary.

It just didn't make sense unless someone was intentionally making Hornstock appear guilty. Therefore Internal Affairs released Hornstock from custody and the captain was able to give Rosewood a walk through at Janice's house. Janice it seems had never gotten over Hornstock so she still had photos of him everywhere as well as a scrapbook of all his arrests.

But for some reason she highlighted the people he arrested in that scrapbook of hers. So Rosewood, Villa, and Hornstock all went to check the man out and after he was done shooting at them — their perp admitted that he did know Janice. Janice had owed him money and when she couldn't come up with it then she tried to hire the other man to offing Hornstock for the insurance policy still out on him.

So that money Janice had been asking Hornstock for earlier was actually for his own hit. And when she didn't get it, the other man decided to cut his losses and simply kill Janice to stop her from ever ratting him out.

And, not that surprisingly, what Janice did made Hornstock realize how much his ex-wife must have hated him. Though that revelation didn't affect him as much as Rosewood hoped because ultimately Hornstock didn't want to change. Or start an open line of communication with any of his wives.

He likes not listening to them and that's why he's been married four times.

Yet what's Rosewood's parents's excuse. His father finally came back from his book tour and it turns out the older Rosewoods are getting a divorce.

Production Code: LAYJ07
Summary: Beaumont faces his dad in court when the two are expert witnesses for the prosecution and defense, respectively. Later, a surprise announcement by Donna and Beaumont Sr. has unforeseen consequences.

The relationship between Rosewood and his father could be described, at best, complicated. Apparently junior had gone into his profession because of his admiration for his father's work as a Medical Examiner but unfortunately the two came to disagree on the best way to handle a body in their care. So at the time they did what was best and dissolved their working partnership.

However that doesn't mean that their work hasn't overlapped over the years. It seems they had both been brought in to review Anton Monroe's case. Anton was a pro-surfer with his life ahead of him when one drunken night changed everything. He was suddenly diagnosed with surfer's myelopathy after he had woken up with no idea of what happened the night before and so there's a question surrounding the night Anton had no memory of.

The victim later claimed that he was started to remember what happened and he believed he had gotten into a nasty argument with his swimming coach who he was about to replace. But sadly Anton later died from his injuries and the Senior Beaumont refused to take on the case. So Senior's claim at the time was that he had found no wrong doing involved.

Yet Rosewood was approached not long after his father was and he claimed to have seen something his father missed. He said the victim had been injected with a syringe on the night no one could recall and that's what caused him to be diagnosed with surfer's myelopathy. It seems Rosewood believes that someone had attempted to give Anton a pulmonary embolism that should have killed him and instead made the victim a quadriplegic.

So at the murder trial for Anton Monroe, both Rosewood and his father were the dueling expert witnesses for the prosecution and the defense.

Rosewood stood by his analysis and was even prepared to testify to the fact that Anton had been murdered meanwhile his father was there for the defense ready to knock down whatever argument Rosewood could come up with. Therefore the men were taking their work into their personal lives and disrupting courting by bringing their personal issues in front of a judge. But all of that was pretty harmless until Rosewood's mother received a subpoena to testify against her husband.

Pippy didn't fare any better because she too received a summons to testify against her brother. Though the defense would have always have used the fact Rosewood treats himself as evidence he was misusing drugs. Donna Rosewood on the other hand had to answer some questions about the night her husband was caught drinking and driving. And it turns out Senior and his wife were holding something back.

It seems they had previously gotten a friend of Senior's to test their DNA because at one point they were still looking for answers as to how their son was born the way he was. And the results did come back but it wasn't good. Apparently their friend ended up finding out about Senior's unknown genetic defect and so when Senior learned about — he began to drink to excess and was soon caught by the police for being 0.1 over the limit.

So Rosewood had heard about that, he felt hurt. He would have liked it if his father had come to tell the news before a trial forced him to and unfortunately that drudged up a lot of old issues from the past. Like how Rosewood had always wanted to have a father but he felt he constantly stuck with a doctor.

Senior was his doctor after all and a lot of the time the son felt like his treatment got in the way of just having a normal relationship with his dad. So that's why he went on to fire his dad as his doctor. It looks like he had been hoping things would change after that.

But just as Rosewood coming to a breaking point, Villa entered the picture and stepped up as a friend. She had decided to help Rosewood prove that Anton was murdered and together they talked Anton's parents into allowing another autopsy. Only no one had anticipated that the judge on the case would make both Rosewood and Senior work on the autopsy together.

By then, everyone knew they couldn't play so well together yet the judge found a reason to ignore that and another autopsy was carried out.

And in the end, both men agreed that Anton was murdered but they didn't think it was his coach seeking revenge. Remember the pulmonary embolism. Well it turns out that neither of the doctors had actually checked the embolism itself. So when they did that's when it became clear that someone had injected Anton with gel around the time of his death and that it was his status as quadriplegic that brought about his death.

So the doctors passed on their information to Villa and she brought in Jeff. Jeff had once been Anton's teammate and it looks like had attacked Anton on the night he couldn't recall. But then Anton began remembering certain events so that had freaked Jeff out enough to inject the other man with a gel like substance that he knew would kill his former rival.

Therefore both of the Rosewood had been right in their own way. Our Rosewood knew Anton had been murdered but his father was right when he said Anton's coach was innocent.

And though they will still butt heads in the future, the case did bring Senior and his son closer together.

Production Code:	1AYJ08
Summary:	The search for a murderer in the Everglades teams Rosewood and Villa up with a bounty hunter who happens to be Hornstock's former partner. Meanwhile, Pippy gets a big chance to launch her music career; and Villa tries to repair her relationship with her mom.

Captain Hornstock's old partner Floyd Butters was in town and he needed help with closing a case. Apparently Butters left the job in order to go work for himself as a bounty hunter and he was recently given Marlan Guzman's case. Guzman being a notorious thief that no one has ever managed to catch.

Yet Butters didn't show up on Hornstock's door because of the price on Guzman's head. He claimed to be hunting Guzman for making it personal when he killed one of Butters' fellow bounty hunter. A man named Tex Bridgewater.

Now Butters and Bridgewater were in competition with each other but Butters swore that there was a code amongst them that made him desire justice for Bridgewater. So on tonight's episode of "Rosewood" Hornstock assigned Villa and Rosewood to the Bridgewater's case. He said it was their job to help Butters in what capacity his old friend might need.

And Villa blatantly decided to ignore her captain's order. She was still going to work the homicide but she didn't want to work with or being answerable to Butters. Who she felt was a back in the day kind of detective.

Therefore Villa had a problem with checking her attitude and her situation with a termite infestation back at her place might have put her especially on edge. As many of us know, houses have to be tented whenever there's a termite problem and that means the owner or renter has to find other living accommodations until the house has been cleared. Yet Villa didn't want to take Rosewood up on his offer to stay at in his spare room so she moved back (albeit temporarily) with her mother.

Though Villa doesn't seem to actually care for her mother who she tends to dismiss as a woman that had barely parented her. So Villa was just upset with everyone and eventually she began to have doubts about Butters. Who she later felt was holding back on her in terms of information.

Butters had allegedly been hunting Guzman for the past three weeks yet Villa and Rosewood were seemingly ahead of him when they found out Guzman suffered a rare blood disorder. Rosewood you see had found out that Guzman suffers a form of hemophilia after he found a couple of drops mixed into Bridgewater gator ravaged remains. And that the condition was bound to force Guzman into staying in town seeing as he just a few drops would be enough to incapacitate their thief.

So Rosewood, Villa, and Butters checked out the nearest blood bank. However, by then, they had been too late. Guzman had already tied up a delivery driver and had impersonated him long enough to get the blood he needed.

Only Guzman didn't then leave town which was what everyone had expected him to do. Instead he stuck around and had even broken into the police department. And that's part hadn't made any sort of sense.

Not even when they asked or in Villa's case demanded that Butters tell them everything he knew about Guzman. Primarily because Butters didn't have much to say. So Villa decided to investigate the rest of the case using her head and she ultimately came up with why someone like Guzman would stick around. She and Rosewood realized the two hundred grand that Guzman stole earlier must have still been in hidden where Bridgewater was found.

But the money had been gone by time Villa double-tracked. So there didn't seem to be anything else that the detectives could use.

Yet Guzman did something strange. He later turned himself in. He said he heard Rosewood when he was in the police department and he knew Rosewood was the only one that knew he was innocent of murder. So that's why he turned himself in with Rosewood.

Only Rosewood needed Villa to help Guzman so together they investigated who really had shot Bridgewater that night and it turns out Guzman's daughter was their culprit. She had shot at Guzman and Bridgewater that night when she saw them fighting and she had did so in order to protect her dad. Yet her inference caused Bridgewater to accidentally shoot himself.

Apparently the teenager had figured out for herself that Bridgewater wasn't like the other bounty hunters. He didn't want to catch her dad alive, he wanted to steal the two hundred thousand then kill Guzman. So when she realized she was right — she fired a couple shots off and that had ended up grazing her dad.

So the only truly hateful persona it seems had been Bridgewater. Although what his actions did end up bringing Guzman and his daughter close together.

And later Villa decided to go easy on her mom. She had been wrong to doubt Butters and it turns out her mom did try to become a better parent.

Summary: Miami Fashion Week isn't all glitz and glamor when a plot to murder a top designer is uncovered, which leads Rosewood to reflect on his past and Villa to start thinking about her romantic prospects when he asks for help from his best friend and colleague, Dr. Mike Boyce. Meanwhile, Donna tries online dating; and Pippy is stunned by a secret that TMI has been keeping from her.

Given his situation with women from his past, Rosewood felt it would be in his best interest to simply take Villa of all people to the latest runway show.

That way she can act as his friend as well as be a potential buffer if Rosewood were to need to one. However it wasn't long after the show wrapped up that Rosewood ended up ditching his very good friend in order to accept a personal invitation from the designer to meet backstage. The same designer that he had apparently first met years ago when they had been a teenagers in high school and who was now going by another name. To match the lifestyle.

But as it turns out Gigi Gaston hadn't asked Rosewood backstage to reminisce over what could have been or even to flirt. She asked him to meet her because she had really needed help. Someone has been threatening her lately and she feels like the person might have upgraded to attempted murder.

Gigi sadly had an unfortunate rash on her back that her general doctor couldn't explain. So Gigi went to Rosewood in order have him look into the rash but also keep an investigation on the down low.

Apparently Gigi's company was about to make a multi-million dollar deal and any word or mere hint of a scandal would have detonated it. Thus Rosewood decided to follow Gigi's lead on this one and have Villa look into anyone who might have a problem with Gigi or her company but admittedly on the side. And to further keep things under wraps, Rosewood also went to a doctor friend of his Mike who could treat Gigi for her rash.

Mike is a talented doctor that specializes in infectious diseases and so he was able to help Gigi. But Rosewood might have wished for his friend to ease up on flirting with Villa.

In fact Villa and Mike hit it off right away and they seemed to have exchanged numbers without Rosewood knowing about until afterwards. So sure there was some jealousy though no one used that specific term. And later Rosewood kept finding some reason or another to butt heads with Mike.

Mike on the other hand didn't let Rosewood's constant interruptions or gruff attitude come in the way of flirting with Villa. Therefore Captain Hornstock took it upon himself to do the honors and warn Mike about playing with someone like Villa's feelings. He said Villa deserved something more than being another notch post.

Though the case itself took an unexpected turn. Mike did find the disease that Gigi had been infected with and it did look like someone had purposely caused it with malicious intent but there were only two suspects that Villa and Rosewood could come up with. Gigi's partners Chuy and Angela.

And Angela was later found dead. So that really only left Chuy as their attacker yet the other man had been on a drug fueled binge for the couple of days and says even if he wanted to — he never would have had the strength to do so.

Therefore Chuy came up with another viable suspect. He told them about competing designer Ian Hunter. Ian it seems has had some nasty run-ins with Gigi and the heart of their problems had always been the fact Gigi was the more talented one. And so after they spoke with Chuy, detectives made a move on Ian.

They found him at his fashion event and it had been their plan to bring him as smoothly as possible. However Ian had other ideas. He grabbed one of his own models and was trying to use the woman as a human shield against the cops.

But a gunshot to the knee was what brought him down and in the aftermath Ian had been all too willing to admitting to he used a certain chemical in his latest perfume line. And that chemical had also been known to cause a flesh eating disease. So the police thought Ian had been their guy when instead Ian's records showed Angela had stopped by his perfume warehouse.

It looks like Angela found out her friends and partners were going to cut her own of the business right before they made it big so it had been her plan all along to kill Gigi as a way of destroying their lives. And the deal. Yet Angela had probably scratched herself and so that's how she got infected which was later her cause of death.

So the Miami PD didn't have to worry about a killer when technically their killed was the only one that died.

But with the investigation being wrapped up, Villa ultimately chose to take a chance on Mike and his accept his date on the beach. Now whether that pans out to anything will be interesting to watch.

And in the meantime Rosewood should be worrying about the fact his mother joined Tinder!

Summary: The hunt for a serial killer in Miami's art scene draws the attention of an FBI agent who happens to be TMI's ex-fiancée, but his involvement could be the end of her relationship with Pippy as well as ruin Hornstock's chances to be police chief. Meanwhile, Donna worries about her son when he's the target of a lawsuit that has the potential to destroy Magic City Lab.

Villa was in a better and frankly happier place in her life thanks in large part to her new relationship Mike. And so on tonight's episode of "Rosewood" she felt it was finally time to go back to therapy.

People tend to think therapy should only be for the dark times but often therapy is needed in time of confusion. And that's what Villa had on her own hands. It seems she liked enjoying herself with Mike and truth be told he made her feel good about herself. So that should have been a good thing, right?

Well, it both was and wasn't. Villa's new relationship with someone else made her feel like her she should be ready to let go of her husband. And the fact that she wasn't — was best left up to Cat. Although Cat didn't see anything wrong with Villa keeping an old voicemail from her late husband.

In fact she told the other woman that holding onto the voicemail while she remained confused could actually help Villa more in the long run. It was better for Villa to let go at the moment she felt comfortable enough and not because she felt she had to. So Villa took Cat's advice and chose not to rush into anything.

However Rosewood felt like Villa was going pretty fast with Mike. In his opinion, the two hadn't been together that long and so he didn't think they should be leaving on Villa's birthday no less to go to the Keys together. And that was merely one of the many hints he tried to make.

Only, Villa didn't let her friend get to her and she was really looking forward to her trip with Mike when unfortunately she got the case of a lifetime. A new serial killer had sprung up out of the blue and the guy had been quickly making a name for himself. First, he drained a victim of all their blood and then he wrote a very unique fortune cookie using said blood as his ink.

And that was just victim number one. Victim number two had no blood in his system as well yet somehow someone had removed his heart without leaving an incision behind. So the case was shaping out to be one of a kind. Which also meant it wasn't long before the FBI came breathing down.

Agent Heath Casablanca of the FBI showed up after the second victim had been identified and it turns out he was Tara's ex-fiancée. So that sort of made things uncomfortable. Not only was Heath in charge of dictating to Villa and Hornstock, but when he wasn't harassing them, he was busy trying to arrange lunch with Tara. And that was a situation that she did not know how to handle.

Yet a third victim helped people arrange their priorities. The Killer had hacked into Miami PD's mainframe and had sent them a clue. A clue that eventually led them to a museum where the killer had literally left behind the brain of his third victim. A man the police were never able to identify on their own.

And were actually lucky to be given a name albeit by the killer. See, Villa and Rosewood realized their victims had been kidnapped a good seventy-two hours before their deaths. So they were looking into people reportedly going missing when dispatch sent them a situation of their own. A man's medical alert had gone and when they sent an ambulance to retrieve him — a body couldn't be found.

So Rosewood and Villa took a couple of men as backup to go check out the scene for themselves and there they found Roger. And they assumed he had been a victim because it had been his medical alert that had gone off. However the warehouse he was found in had been filled of paraphernalia and even had the killer's manifesto drawn all over the walls.

Apparently the killer had been targeting people that were crooked. Either con men or men that were dishonorable discharged from the army. And, you know what, Hornstock didn't think the killer would have let anyone see something that explains them so well.

Therefore he had Villa and Rosewood look into Roger. And the guys realized Roger's description of the killer had in fact been a body suit that he wore while he was on a killing spree.

So the Miami PD and more importantly Hornstock closed one of their biggest cases to date. And the timing couldn't be more perfect. Hornstock had been up for the position as Chief and it's a job he's always dreamed about.

But, just as people were getting comfortable, and Rosewood and Villa were having a "moment" — the killer left them a message. He wanted them to know they had the wrong guy and he seemed to want to rub their noses in it.

Summary:	As things heat up between Villa and Mike, Villa escapes by throwing herself deeper into the case, which inevitably pushes her closer to Rosewood. Meanwhile, Donna intervenes when Pippy decides to give TMI's absentee mother a piece of her mind. Plus, the Chief position is Hornstock's, if he is willing to pay a stiff price.

There was a serial killer on the loose and apparently he decided to change his MO from exposing hypocrisy to stalking Rosewood.

Originally this serial killer had taken pleasure in misdirecting Miami PD with his pieces of "art" that was made from his victims and for a while this had left them at their wits end, but then something changed. Out of nowhere their perp had pretended to get sloppy and he fooled Detective Villa into believing she could honestly capture him. Which was what she thought she did when she had arrested this Roger who had claimed to be kidnapped by the serial killer yet hadn't mentioned the profile picture he was giving them was that of a mask.

But Roger was soon cleared when another person broke into Rosewood's office and had left a message at the lab that was seemingly written in saliva while Roger had still been in lock up. Only the saliva hadn't belonged to their serial killer. It had matched a woman named Jennifer Lee that had been reported missing by her roommate.

So Villa had been forced into admitting she had made a mistake and unfortunately her boss Captain Hornstock had to take the wrap for it in front of the press. What with the press naturally wanting someone to blame for the fact a serial killer had still been on the loose and was therefore able to kidnap a fresh victim without the cops knowing about it, but Rosewood had thought the blame game was unfair. And so he chose to do the one that Villa told him not.

He spoke up at the press conference and had told the reports to stop calling what the serial killer was doing — art. Rosewood would then go on to say that real art had the ability to inspire and invoke emotion. And so the serial killer decided to respond by setting out a new piece just a few feet away from Villa and her mother's home.

Apparently the body of Jennifer Lee had been arranged to make it appear as if she was a statue and Villa had admittedly been thrown by what she saw. Yet, once she got over her initial shock, she had called the body in and had Rosewood come down personally to check out the body. While she questioned her mother over what the older woman claimed to have saw.

Daisie Villa said she saw a car parked in oddly the night before so Villa had her mother come down to the station to give a description. Only her mother was more interested in flirting with the captain than with helping her apprehend a serial killer. So Villa ended up needing Mike for some R&R afterwards.

And after the two had left the supply closet at the hospital, they had run into Rosewood. Rosewood had gone to the hospital with Kat's husband because an altercation between them had resulted in the husband's injured hand. Yet Rosewood had been surprised by Villa's disheveled appearance.

He didn't think supply closets were her thing, but she hadn't been too interested in what he thought. Her captain had finally pinpointed who had hacked his station a while back and so Villa had met up with him to arrest a hacker by the name of Killswitch. Only Killswitch turned out to be a seventeen-year-old girl whose real name was Andi.

And, boy, did Andi had a mouth on her. She said now that everyone knew she had hacked the police department; million-dollar security companies will be beating down her front door. So she was only got to hand over the email of the person that hired her as long as she got immunity as well as having as the recognition she wanted.

But Andi was eventually kidnapped by the serial killer so her life had been in Villa and Rosewood's hands.

It seems the killer had tricked the police into believing they were going to meet Rosewood for lunch when actually they had targeted Andi. And had begged Rosewood to figure it all out in time to save the teenager. So Rosewood had gone back to the first victim and had tried to figure out why he had been chosen.

And the answer he finally came to was that the first victim had stolen their killer's artwork. Apparently the killer was an artist and the first victim as well as Jennifer had conspired to steal their artwork and profit from it. Therefore, the reason the killer had gone on a spree and desecrated the victims' bodies into looking like art was because they desperately wanted recognition for themselves as a true artist.

So the killer had left behind enough clues for Rosewood to find her and, when he did, Ms. Katz had thanked him right before she attempted to murder him. But Villa had thankfully been there and she had managed to stop a deranged woman in her tracks. And that had allowed Rosewood to save Andi from the poison in her system.

However, when all was said and done, the current police chief told Hornstock to fire Villa if he wanted that promotion he's been vying for and Hornstock chose to turn him down. He said he wasn't going to stab people in the back in order to become the newest Police Chief. And he called the man that was still technically his boss spineless for demanding him to go against his principles.

And therefore Hornstock won't be going anywhere, but somehow both Villa and Rosewood lost out when their respected loved ones left them.

Rosewood had told Kat to return to her husband if she still loved him which she did. Meanwhile Mike had ultimately decided to take the doctors without borders position because Villa had been dragging her feet on asking him to stay for her. So, by the end of this episode, both Rosewood and Villa were surprisingly single.

Summary: Hornstock forces Villa to pick a new partner, and she immediately clashes with the one assigned to her.

Lately, Villa has been trying to make herself more accommodating. It seems that she had found out her captain had lost out on the Chief of Police job because he had been unwilling to fire her last week. And so on tonight's episode she finally agreed to getting a partner.

Only Villa's agreement ended up being easier said than done. Somehow the detective found a way to shoot down one option after another and it resulted in her still being without a partner when a new case happened to fall in her lap. And the latest case also just happened to be high-profile.

The body of a fifteen-year-old girl had been found in some wooded areas and there had been no identification whatsoever. However, things only got worse with investigation when the official medical examiner was actually stumped on the cause of death. Max said he tried everything and was able to determine the girl hadn't been dead for long, but he knew none of his usual methods were going to yield results so he was forced to turn to Rosewood on this one.

And Rosewood did offer to help. His lab was later able to facial reconstruct the victim's face and therefore they knew what the badly decomposed body originally looked like. Yet it was Pippy that had figured out something crucial regarding the victim.

Apparently she had noticed the varicose veins, the malnourishment, and also the obvious stress on the feet as symptoms often recognized in the homeless. So she knew their Jane Doe had been homeless and possibly a runaway. And the reason Pippy had saw the signs before her brother was because she herself had once ran away and had lived two months out on the streets.

Which is something her fiancée hadn't known about. Though there was a lot Tara didn't know like why Pippy even felt the need to run away. Pippy, you see, had come out to her family when she was a teenager and she had been supported by both her brother as well as her father. Donna on the other hand hadn't supported her child.

In fact, she tried to tell Pippy to be something different all because she wasn't going to allow her child to be gay. So, although Donna is a different person now, maybe she shouldn't have judged Tara's mother so harshly seeing as she knew where the other woman was coming from. And only saw the light once her daughter had chosen to live on the streets rather than be in the same house as her.

But that's Donna. Pippy had told her mother that she likes to rewrite history and it seems that's been a common feature of Donna's.

Pippy though wanted to help in Villa's investigation and so two Rosewoods on the case caused a problem with Villa's new partner. Villa's partner Martinez was a stickler for procedure and thus their partnership lasted all four hours before he told her that he was going to be asked to be placed with someone else. And while Villa preferred it just being her and Rosie, she truly felt dumped by the fact Martinez couldn't last a whole shift with her.

Yet Rosewood found it funny. He too liked what he has with Villa and they didn't really need any additional people, but at least Pippy was able to connect them with some of her old contacts on the street. And that led to Villa finding a friend of the victim who could finally identify her.

The kid that died was Alice. Alice and her friend Kira used to steal from people and the detective assumed it was to pay off their drug habit because drugs had been in Alice's autopsy. However, there was something more pressing to worry about.

The two girls were apparently never far from each other's side. So Villa and Rosewood had to look for Kira before whatever happened to Alice happened to her. And their best bet lied with the girls' mutual friend Oscar.

Only Oscar was ill. He had been taken to the hospital by Villa and Rosewood and it turns out the hazards of being exposed to meth had played havoc on his system. But, despite receiving medical care because of them, Oscar refused to talk the police because he hadn't want to snitch on the group's hiding spots.

So that's when Rosewood told Oscar about his sister. The same sister that he had been very concerned about and who he knew needed help while she was away. And so Oscar eventually did tell the two where they could find Kira.

And they found her alive at some abandoned house, but she too needed help. It was later revealed that Kira and her friends had been living in an old rental property that was still owned by her parents. Though that rental property had been used to cook meth.

Thus they were making themselves sick every time they breathed in the air. Yet, Kira's parents hadn't been the one behind the drugs at the house. It had instead been a trusted friend of theirs that had used the place knowing it was going to be reclaimed by the bank in the end. And the same friend had found out Kira was staying there but didn't say anything and went on to kill Alice when she had seen him.

And truthfully both Alice and Kira had come from good homes. They had just run away because they had been lost. Like Pippy had once been.

Only, once the case had wrapped up, Captain Hornstock decided to do Pippy a favor. He found the friend she had made and who had protected her on the streets. And as it happens, Cassie also turned her life around.

Summary:	Villa gets a new partner, with whom she shares a past, for the investigation of the murder of a dentist who ran a drug ring for yuppies in the suburbs, but Rosewood suspects this detective has intimate knowledge of the victim's business. Meanwhile, a new medical examiner is tapped to handle the case; and Hornstock needs help with public relations.

Dr. Gus Willing was a well-known dentist in Miami. Apparently the doctors had a client list that looked more like a Forbes list than anything else and it seems he used to give these special clients whatever drugs they wanted. And yet, despite being so amendable, someone had shot him in front one of his regular clients.

So Captain Hornstock really wanted to solve this one. Both he and his narcotics team had completely overlooked the good doctor and therefore they have no idea about which of his clients were notoriously drug users and which were just clients. Though Hornstock had technically been a little bit more concerned with the embarrassment of the whole thing and so he only wanted his top people to investigate Willing's murder. And that's why he gave the case to Villa rather than to narcotics.

However, Hornstock wasn't perfect because while giving the case to Villa had been a good decision he then made the mistake of teaming her up with a new transfer. A Detective Russ Hame that Villa had unfortunately met years ago. And who she didn't want to know now.

Only Hornstock pushed the issue and Villa ultimately decided to at least try to work with Russ, but Rosewood hadn't exactly felt the same way. Rosewood had also been put on the case after Max the regular medical examiner had gone through a faze that made him replaced the victim's organs with stuffing paper. So Rosewood also had Hornstock breathing down his neck yet he still found time to question Hornstock's decision to partner Villa with Russ. Russ being someone that Rosewood had felt was immature.

Yet, Hornstock and Villa for that matter had asked Rosewood to just focus on the case. They needed an autopsy of the bullet that had still been in Willing. And therefore they wanted Rosewood to hurry up with the results so that they could get back to work though, for some reason, Rosewood simply refused to be regulated back to a pathologist.

He said that he could help out in other words and later he constantly tried to insert himself in the investigation. So Villa had to take him aside after one of these incidents and she told him that she has a partner. A real partner that was a cop and not merely pretending to be one.

And Rosie was hurt. He didn't want to admit it, but he had grown slightly jealous of Villa's new working relationship with Russ that sometimes felt personal. In fact, Villa and Russ hadn't even been partners for a day when Villa managed to take his side over Rosewood's.

So later Rosewood decided to do something a bit out there. It seems he actively chose to investigate Russ even if was at the cost of his other case and ongoing case. And he also managed to drag the interim medical examiner that had taken over once Max had been put on a leave into his side investigation as well.

Anita who was an old friend of Rosewood had told him about Russ's former partner and she had also given him a file on the late detective. Apparently Russ and his partner Garrett had been involved in a shoot-out that ended with Garrett's death, but Anita had some reservations. She said there were some discrepancies in the Garrett's file and so she hadn't fought Rosewood over his decision to take the file back to his own lab.

But Villa had caught him looking at Garrett's case and she had torn into him. She shouted at him that he wasn't a cop and that he should finally stop acting like he was one. Then she left his place to go see her captain who she asked to step before Rosewood ruined their internal investigation into Russ's involvement in his partner's death.

Thus Hornstock and Villa knew that Russ was dirty however they were waiting to act until they had all their ducks in a row. Which is why Russ had gotten assigned as Villa's partner. The two had working history and the higher powers figured he would be more willing to trust her than anyone else. Yet, Rosewood was set on separating Villa from Russ and all that led to there being a problem.

Russ grew to be suspicious of Villa and, when they had went to interview a known drug dealer that could be pushing in on the dentist's old territory, he managed to make a deal with "Nova" when Villa's back was turned. Though the only reason her back had been turned was because Rosewood had showed up again and she had to take him to a side for a chat about boundaries. So Rosewood cost Villa an opportunity.

And Russ had made arrangements to fake another shoot-out with "Nova's" help.

So Villa later walked into a trap of Russ's making and at first it had seemed like her only backup had been Rosewood. Rosewood who had continued looking into Russ and who recently found the proof that Russ had shot himself as well as his partner. And therefore, when he saw Villa and Russ driving away, he decided to follow.

However, Villa didn't need his help. She knew that Russ wouldn't be able to shoot her and "Nova" turned out to be an undercover DEA agent. Who had been working with Villa and Hornstock to take Russ down. Thus the only person that hadn't known about the Russ operation had been Rosewood who was left feeling silly, but Villa had apologized afterwards for everything she had said.

And with their minds again focused on the dentist — they found out his neighbor shot him for sleeping with his wife.

Summary: Joo Joo is a prime suspect in Rosewood and Villa's next case, and they discover a side of their informant they never knew existed, even though he might go to jail for the rest of his life. Meanwhile, Hornstock is perplexed by the new chief's personality; Rosewood is concerned about Villa's choice of a place to live; and Pippy and TMI have a hard time balancing old acquaintances and family.

Rosie managed to drag Villa out of the house on tonight's episode "Rosewood", but it seems he forgot to tell her that he was taking her to a Joo-Joo party to celebrate their nine month anniversary as partners.

Although Villa was capable of letting these small things go and did just that when she chose to stay on the party and enjoy her. Probably a little too much! Villa had been wrecked afterwards and so Rosewood had been responsible enough to see that she got home yet he ended up staying the night at her new place. Albeit on her couch because that's where they had fallen asleep after watching TV into the late hours.

And so that's where he later woke up when Joo-Joo called him in a panic. Apparently Joo-Joo whose real name was Julius had woken up next to a dead body and he has no idea what led to them being in the same room much less what happened at the part. So when Rosewood and Villa (the latter not having been invited) showed up, they quickly took charge and Rosewood personally checked Joo-Joo for injuries.

Only the situation didn't look good and Joo-Joo knew that long before the detective in the room called in backup. For example, Joo-Joo had a bump on his head that could have meant someone had knocked him out which would explain why he doesn't recall his own party or, as Villa pointed out, it could have occurred when the victim tried to defend herself. And unfortunately there was also some bruising on Joo-Joo's hands so he could have been in a fight or again the bruises could be because of the victim.

The victim being a well-known reality star by the name of Holly Keaton. So one of the first things that Captain Hornstock and Villa asked about was how did Joo-Joo know Holly and he said she was something of a business partner. Which in this case means he hired her to come by his parties with her long line of paparazzi and she in turned drummed up publicity. And so Joo-Joo had even use that as an excuse for why he would never hurt her.

He said that he wouldn't mess around with the cash cow!

However, that didn't explain why they were alone in a bedroom together and Joo-Joo couldn't speak towards his own defense because he couldn't remember why they had been alone. So Rosewood talked Hornstock into releasing Joo-Joo into his custody. And the captain agreed to it as long as Villa was also there to supervise, but she did fall down on the job.

Though it wasn't her fault, it was Rosewood's. Rosewood who had also been responsible for Joo-Joo had taken the suspect back to his lab where they then ran into Holly's fiancée. So the grieving fiancée hadn't liked seeing that Joo-Joo was out and he had tried to attack Joo-Joo yet Joo-Joo struck first. He punched Zachary Wilford III in front of a room full of witnesses and, well, that hadn't been Joo-Joo's first assault.

So Joo-Joo was in fact later arrested for assault against a member of the paparazzi that he allegedly beat up on the night of the party, but he still couldn't recall the party itself or why he would even beat up a photographer for just taking photos of Holly. Although, the testing that Rosewood had done on Joo-Joo earlier had answered a few questions. It seems Joo-Joo was suffering from brain damage that was stemming from his old career in professional football so he meant it when he said he couldn't remember. He's actually been experiencing memory lapses for a while.

And therefore to get to the bottom of why he had assaulted Jo Fuller, Villa and Rosewood looked through the many photos from that night. Thus they found the photos of Fuller grabbing Holly's arm and shoving her. Then, thanks to the time stamp, they found out what happened next which was Joo-Joo punching Fuller because he had been defending Holly.

Yet, there had been a reason for Fuller's hostility that night and Villa hadn't been afraid to get rough with him if need be. So eventually Fuller did reveal that he had gotten into Holly's face because he knew something about her. And may or may not have wanted to extort money out of her in exchange for keeping quiet though he did end up giving Villa what he had.

Which was a sex tape! Apparently Holly who had made her living selling a clean image of herself had also been secretly recorded by an ex-boyfriend that knew her as Hannah Lou from the trailer park. And the ex went on to sell the tape to Fuller once he realized that Holly's fiancée wasn't interested in what was supposedly in Holly's past.

At least that's how he phrased it. The text message to Zach had said to call him if he wants to know who he's really marrying and he had thought that would be important to Zach because he came from a prominent family yet Zach never got the text. Instead, his mother did and so she thought she should protect Zach from marrying trailer trash by killing Holly and Joo-Joo being there as well was just bad timing. It looks like Joo-Joo had gone to check on Holly to see if she was ok after the altercation when Mrs. Wilford knocked him out and left him in the room knowing how it would look.

But, Rosewood and Villa caught her when they found the missing diamond from her ring in Holly's stomach so Zach was eventually told that his mother had murdered his fiancée. And the sad part is he had known about Holly's past from the beginning. She had told him herself and he hadn't thought it mattered.

And a surprise guest dropped in on tonight's episode, Tara's mother who says she now wants to be part of Tara's life though she still wants the ability to control everything that happens with her daughter. So the reunion hadn't gone as planned and its good thing that Tara has the Rosewoods.

Summary: Rosewood goes to a convention for forensic pathologists in another city and inadvertently describes how to commit the perfect murder in a speech. Meanwhile, Hornstock and Butters help out with Rosewood and Villa's undercover investigation; and TMI gets a visit from her estranged father when she and Pippy are working overtime in the lab.

Apparently there's such a thing as being too helpful: Dr. Beaumont Rosewood Jr. had gone to an out of town conference that was supposed to be on forensic pathology, but unfortunately he had gotten a little carried away with his keynote speech. The interesting speech, itself, had been about the perfect murder and how easy it was to kill someone by faking something called atherosclerosis. Yet Rosewood had no idea that he would wake up the next morning and suddenly find someone had just died of the same heart attack that he had once claimed could be faked.

So naturally that had raised some internal alarms though there was nothing Rosewood could do. Dr. Wambach who had been a fellow pathologist had been found dead in his hotel room of an apparent heart attack and no one had wanted to question that. But Rosewood suspected something a little more nefarious. He thought that someone had used his "blueprint" for the perfect murder and that would therefore mean that Wambach's death was directly his fault.

And so Rosewood then realized he had to investigate Wambach's death whether the local police were willing to listen or not.

Though, Rosewood was luckily able to at least depend on his good friend Villa. He had later called her for help and she hadn't even hesitated. She simply took his assumption as the truth and drove down to the conference to see what she could do. Although it wasn't much. The same police that had wanted to exclude Rosewood from Wambach's autopsy had also wanted to do the same to Villa. Who they believed was acting outside of her jurisdiction.

Which was true, but that hadn't wanted to hear her reasoning or let Rosewood explain why he didn't think Wambach's death resulted from a heart attack. The local police just wanted to believe they had an open-shut case and it didn't help that the victim has had two heart procedures in the past couple of years. Implying that Wambach did have troubling heart issues.

Yet, Rosewood had felt so sure about this one that his people decided to go rogue for him. Pippy and Tara had looked in Wambach from their end and surprisingly Hornstock and his old friend who happened to be a retired detective showed up at the hotel in order to help Villa split up the suspects. There had been Dr. Kipley Reed who had always been a bit of a show-off at such events and so he viewed Wambach as natural competition. And there had also been a call girl.

The call girl had been caught on security cameras entering Wambach's room on the night before his body was found. So she was the last one to see the victim alive. Though for a call girl she ended up having a lot to say about Reed. Who had apparently once worked with Wambach before they had a huge fight.

However, back in Miami, Tara had a run-in with her father. The same father that had sided with her mother two years ago in cutting her off and ignoring her phone calls. So Tara hadn't exactly been in a mood to forgive her dad when he finally realized that she was still his daughter and that her being gay shouldn't change that, but Pippy had walked in on the end of their conversation. And she had wanted to know what "money"?

Tara it seems had gotten a check from her mother a while back and technically it supposed to induce her into changing her job because people in their family shouldn't be working around the dead. Yet, Tara had turned down that money. She hadn't wanted it and she still didn't so she had gone to pretend the conversation hadn't taken place. And that included hiding it from her fiancée who was left wondering why. Why didn't Tara think she could trust Pippy with the truth?

Only back at the never-ending conference, Rosewood and Villa had gone to dinner with Reed and his wife. Though they couldn't find a single thing that made them think Reed was their guy. So instead of getting out of their dinner as soon as possible, the two remained at the table and actually ended up enjoying themselves as a fake couple. That for a second they had nearly convinced themselves that they could be more than partners and friends.

And thus there was scene during tonight's episode where it looked as if Rosewood had wanted to go to Villa's room and vice versa. But she had stayed put because she hadn't wanted to cross that line and eventually she came to congratulate herself for not going to Rosewood's room. Especially as she later heard another woman go in there and stay overnight.

Although that particular woman had been Rosewood's doctor. Dr. Erica Kincaid had been running after Rosewood to get a new blood sample and he had basically been holding her off while he worked Wambach's death. So Erica ended up going to him at his hotel room and incidentally she soon fell asleep after running him through his blood work. And as there was some flirting, she did seem to be interested in Rosewood as more than her patient though she had been strictly professional with him in his hotel room.

So there was nothing for Villa to worry about, but she did put up some walls between her and Rosie afterwards.

Nevertheless, though, Villa and Rosewood still continued working the case and they did in the end get the medical examiner to allow Rosewood to view the body. And not that surprisingly he found murder. There had been a scar in the victim's throat that meant someone had stuck something down there when he was too weak to fight back and that object had been a piece of ice. Ice naturally melts so the killer thought that would be the perfect weapon over the broccoli that Rosewood had described in his speech, but it left behind burned marks in the throat. And so Villa was able to arrest Casey Reed. Casey was Kipley's wife and apparently she had gotten tired of him getting overlooked in favor Wambach so she killed the competition in order to get her husband a promotion. A promotion, by the way, that would allow them to stay in the city rather than move to Portland.

So Casey was arrested and Rosewood was able to finally close the case. But he had noticed Villa's behavior and he had tried to tell her about his feelings for her when she stopped him. She said they did a good undercover job as a couple yet she didn't want to talk about the real elephant in the room.

Summary: A case hits close to home for Rosewood during the investigation of the suspicious death of a man whose condition mirrors his own. Meanwhile, Donna and Erica clash over what they think is best for Rosewood; and Hornstock asks Villa for help reaching out to his estranged teen daughter, who happens to be a witness in the case.

Villa and Rosewood have been on the outs lately. Apparently Villa had a house warming party and she practically invited everyone, but Rosewood. So Rosewood did what he normally does. He just showed up and tried to smooth talk his way into the party. Only he didn't think that Villa would quick him out because that's exactly what she did. Villa had looked at Rosewood with his new jacket and new shirt and she had seen that he had only been stopping by for her when really he had gotten dressed for someone else. So Villa told her mother to make Rosewood a to-go plate and then Rosewood had been pushed out of the party.

And that had hurt Rosewood yet Villa had been right when she guessed that he had other plans. Rosewood and his cardiologist have finally crossed that line from just being doctor and patient. So the two have begun sleeping together and unfortunately she got to meet his mother before either of them had been ready for that. Though it could have been helped if Rosewood had remembered that his mother likes to stop by to make him some special tea for his heart.

So imagine Donna's surprise to find out that not only had she walked in on something, but that her son was sleeping with his cardiologist that also told Donna that Rosewood wasn't going to be drinking anymore of her special tea. It seems that while the tea strengthens Rosewood's heart, Erica had come up with a new plan to help Rosewood and so she's now has him on pomegranate juice. That she has deemed is more beneficial.

However, Rosewood didn't want his mother to judge him so he told Donna to stay in his lane. Then he quietly fled the scene in order to invite himself onto another case. A base jumper had crashed landed on a parked car. And that parked car had belonged to Brody who happens to be dating Captain Hornstock's daughter Sophie.

No need to guess why the car had been parked!

Only the medical examiner at the scene had said that Darrin Barber had died before he hit the car. So when Rosewood did arrive unannounced, he decided to test Darrin's parachute. Which included a backup that he could have pulled if the first one failed. And he proved that Darrin had been murdered.

The parachute hadn't been deployed, the backup parachute hadn't been deployed, and so Darrin had been dead before he had gotten a chance to deploy what he needed not to crash. Though Rosewood would have probably have deduced something else as well however there was something about the victim that scared him. Darrin apparently had a scar down his chest like Rosewood's so Rosewood knew that Darrin had probably been like him. Born premature and was forced to multiple surgeries throughout his childhood. So Darrin's case ended up being the first one that Rosewood had ever walked away from.

And that had surprised everyone. Villa wasn't used to Rosewood not pushing himself in on her investigation and even Hornstock had seemed concerned. It just hadn't made sense for Rosewood to come down to the crime scene and then suddenly say he was busy with other things. So Villa had stopped by his office and basically she pushed him into working the case. She implied that if he wasn't scared of dealing with someone so similar to him then he wouldn't mind taking on Darrin's case.

So Rosewood did take back his words from earlier and he decided to work the case back at his offices. Yet, what Rosewood hadn't counted on was that both his mother and sister would be just as upset as he was by looking at Darrin. They had initially tried to be professional, but Rosewood could see the toll it was taking on them. And he had tried to reassure them each in their own way.

Donna though had needed more than a heart to heart with her son. So she had gone to Erica's office and had spoken quite plainly with the other woman. She told Erica that her relationship with her patient affects everyone because it was Rosewood's family that cared about his prognosis. As well as what happens to him if his cardiologist were to suddenly drop him as patient. Which could happen if things were to end badly between Donna and Erica.

And so Donna told Erica that she didn't want to see her son lose the one cardiologist he had managed to trust. But later Rosewood hadn't been happy to hear that Donna had paid Erica a visit. So he had tried to tell his mother that she had crossed a line and, not that surprisingly, she had ignored him.

Only Rosewood didn't get the chance to get upset, at least not that very moment, because he had wanted to take part in his first ever stakeout.

The victim's credit card had been used to make purchases after his death and so someone stole Darrin's credit card. And that someone could have been the person that attacked him a good 48 hours before his death because that's when Rosewood estimated the victim had experienced whiplash that ultimately killed him. So to find Darrin's possible killer, Sophie told the detectives about a scam in which if you steal a credit card and then ship items to the address then the thief could pick up those things without drawing notice.

And so that's how they found their homeless man. Greg had bought up a lot of coats in all different sizes and he had shipped them to Darrin's place. Yet, Greg said he hadn't stolen the credit card. He admitted that he had tried to and that Darrin had caught him in the act. So that's when Darrin surprised him by letting Greg have the card as well as 500 dollars he withdrew from the ATM.

Apparently Darrin wanted Greg to pay it forward and so that's what Greg had been doing with the shipments of coats. He said he was going to hand them out to the people at the shelter. And while Greg's story sounded farfetched, surveillance video from the ATM showed that he had been telling the truth when he said that Darrin had given him those things.

But fortunately Greg hadn't accidentally killed Darrin by causing him a whiplash. Rosewood had taken a second look at the victim and he had found a tumor. A tumor that had been mistaken for something else yet allowed for no one to be blamed.

And even though Donna had believed she was right, she had apologized to Rosewood. She had gone over to his place and actually said the words. Yet, Rosewood had new for her. He said he changed cardiologist because he wanted to see where things went with Erica on a personal level. So Donna had funnily enough put things into perspective for him.

So sometimes a parent can be right and others, such as Hornstock, have to figure out when to let go. And he has to do now that his daughter has told him she's joining the police academy.

Summary:	Rosewood and Villa investigate the murder of a telenovela star, holding a mirror up to their own relationship as they explore a world of off-screen soap and intrigue. Meanwhile, Erica strong-arms her way into Rosewood's life, much to Donna's chagrin. Then, Rosewood's precious GTO is stolen, and Villa reconnects with her mother, Daisie.

Rosewood had recently come to decision that he wanted to see where things went with Erica. Relationship wise! However, Erica was the type of woman that wanted to take things fast instead of slow and she was pushing Rosie outside of comfort zone. And he didn't know how to handle it.

Rosewood was a good a guy so he had no idea how to tell his girlfriend that he didn't feel comfortable with her cooking meals for his family at his place rather than her own. Or that her moving stuff into his place was both something new and scary at the same time. But Rosewood was saved, for a while that is, from having to deal with the problem head on because of the latest case. A telenovela superstar had been found dead at her apartment and foul play was suspected.

Maria De La Vina had been on the breakout hit Passion En Silencio and her death hadn't been clear at first. Maria had been lying on the floor and her apartment had been ransacked so the police knew that something had to have happened because she couldn't have just dropped dead. Yet, the confusion had come about because of the way the crime scene was staged. Things were knocked down and the drawers were all open. Only the very expensive laptop had been left right on the table.

So right away, the police knew that someone tried to stage a robbery and hadn't bothered with actually going through with it seeing as Maria had been the endgame. Maria though hadn't had much bruising on her body and except for the nasty gash wound on her forehead then it didn't seem as if she put up much of a fight. And so both Rosewood and Villa had taken into account of Maria's home which had set for a romantic interlude, but that led to them suspecting Maria's on-again and off-again boyfriend who was also her coworker on the telenovela.

Antonio and Maria had a relationship was both hot and cold. However, Antonio was quite adamant when he said he hadn't hurt her and his biggest fan (Villa's mother) had thought the same. Villa's mother had come down to the police station and she vehemently argued that there was no way Antonio could have hurt anyone much less Maria. And so Villa had received quite a dressing down from her mom. Who by the way had been offended that Villa could even think her favorite telenovela would do such a thing.

Only Villa had no choice. Antonio had admitted to go to Maria's apartment and he said they had a passionate night yet he could have been lying to cover up the scratch marks Maria had left behind. So it wasn't until Rosewood could dismiss Antonio as a suspect with factual evidence that they let him go. But, without Antonio, they had left right back at square one.

With one little difference! Someone had taken Rosewood's car so his pride was hurting and he had been more than just a tad upset that none of the cops he works with had offered to help. So Rosewood could have been disheartened, but he went on to find evidence of strangulation that hadn't made much sense. There had been marks later found on the victim that showed something must have wrapped her neck and so the doctors had been believed that was a good sign. Only the marks disappeared which shouldn't have happened on a decomposing body.

So Pippy and Rosewood were trying to figure that out when a video literally fell into their laps. Villa had found a video of Maria and one of the writers arguing on set. And on the video, the writer who also happens to be a very good friend of Antonio's could be overheard admitting to trying to kill Maria. Though Julia denied that the video had anything to do with Maria's actual murder.

Julia said that she had only meant killing Maria on the show and, that while she loved Antonio, she wouldn't kill him for him. So that's when Julia fully described her relationship with Antonio. Apparently the two have worked closely together for the last ten years and they do have romantic feelings for each other however neither of them had ever acted on it. both Julia and Antonio had said that they had always worried about ruining their partnership so they never wanted to risk it.

Yet, that's changed now because Antonio had found out Julia was being questioned and he had showed up at the police station. To see her and offer her his unwavering support because he didn't think she killed the woman he nearly married. And once Julia had seen that he had come back for her, the two had finally decided to act on their feelings and admit they loved each other.

And so the only thing that could ruin the moment was the fact a killer was still on the loose. But Villa and Rosewood who both denied seeing Antonio and Julia had affected them had also received help from an unexpected source. It seems the two had gone back to the victim's apartment because they were trying to match up what happened to how Maria got something shoved into her mouth and they ended up running Warren. Warren being the creepy neighbor that sees and knows everything.

So Warren had told him about another one of their neighbors who just so happens to like stealing Maria's mail because he had a crush on her and it turns out the neighbor was using the same silk pocket square that had been found at the crime scene. And therefore the guys had their killer, but those disappearing marks had come about from the killer's lotion. That had an ingredient in it that Maria was allergic to.

But Rosewood did eventually find his car and he had even hugged the little thief after the young man had come back to report what he had done. So that solve a second dilemma however this newfound awkwardness between him and Villa needed to be addressed. And so they talked again about being good friends — implying they both wished to stay good friends — before Rosewood went to dinner with his girlfriend and family.

And Erica ruined it all by putting up some fight to say grace.

As it turns out she's not big on religion.

Summary: Rosewood clashes with a rival pathologist on a case involving two bodies and a lot of cash washing up on the beach. Meanwhile, Daisie oversteps her boundaries after she moves in with her daughter; and TMI struggles to keep up with Pippy and Cassie.

Villa had thought the natural choice for all the pathology work when both Anita and the regular Medical Examiner Neil were out of town would be Rosie. However, her captain had some rather unfortunate news for Villa. He said that his bosses have been coming down hard on him about doing his part with the latest budget cuts. And so Captain Hornstock thought the department could save money by using a cheaper freelance pathologist rather.

So admittedly Villa was worried. She generally doesn't like working with new people and frankly she didn't want someone else to swoop in to take Rosewood's job as her partner. Yet, that's where Villa thought her captain was heading. Not only had the captain tried to shut Rosewood out on Villa's latest case involving two John Does, but he also tried to convince her to work with the new guy. And even show up him the ropes.

And therefore Villa she tried to warn Rosewood about said new guy. Mitchell Mendelson or Mitchie as he liked to be called was good at his job and he also went out of his way to get the others at the department to like him. So on his first day giving Hornstock his initial findings, he managed to beat Rosewood (that had taken on the case as practically pro bono) to the department as well as have the time to pick eclairs for everyone.

But despite Mitchie being someone that seemed credible, Villa and then later Rosewood kept trying to cut him out of the picture.

Their John Does had been found washing up on shore at the beach and they had both been retrained. Though what was missing was any forms of identification and one of the victims didn't even have on pants. So at first guess, the victims didn't look as if they knew each other and neither of their deaths hadn't made any sense. And yet tests they ran on the victims eventually showed where the victims first went into the water so that had helped Villa with the case.

However, David Gaines's widow had been the one to provide her husband's name. She and her husband had just arrived in Miami which was supposed to be a romantic trip away together. Only the two later got into a fight. They had argued about money because they've been having problems in that area. So her husband had gone on of his usual walks that he tends to take whenever he gets into a fight with his wife.

So everyone including the new duo called "Mosie" had thought David and Johnny must have run into each other while David was out calming down. But that didn't explain the dominatrix. As in the one that Johnny No Pants had hired. And so "Mosie" felt that maybe they should check each other's work though that ended up causing a few problems.

Rosewood had come to see Mitchie as the threat he was and so he had finally taken Villa's advice that maybe he should take the gloves off. Yet, he hadn't been the one left looking good and he agreed to cross-check his work with Mitchie. Mitchie had apparently caught on to the fact that the victims were heavy into high-stakes gambling based on their posture. So that corroborated with what Villa found.

Villa found out that both men were heavy into debt. So that explained David's money troubles and why he had talked his wife into coming to Miami even though they couldn't afford it. It seems David and Johnny had been part of a trio partnership. Only the third guy was the one person that was still alive to collect whatever winnings there may be so Villa and Mitchie had gone to collect Sal. Albeit without Rosewood.

Which of course made Rosewood jealous. Rosewood had wanted to be the hero like always and he hadn't appreciated the fact he had been cut out from talking to Sal. So he had come across as a bit overbearing when he had run into Villa later. And that had made her discount everything he was saying including the part where he told her he didn't think Sal had killed his friends.

He said that he had a gut feeling, but she thought he didn't want to give this win to Mitchie. Though once Rosewood had calmed down and he talked over the case with Villa, the two had come up with another theory of what happened to Dave and Johnny. So Rosewood had gone back to the lab and he had figured out that Sal hadn't killed his friends because Dave and Johnny had killed each other.

Johnny and Sal had money to burn though David didn't. So David had gone to Johnny's boat, knocked out the dominatrix, and ended up fighting Johnny until both men went overboard. And so Mitchie was left looking like a fool because he had discounted what he was a lava bean when in actuality it was a piece of the other guy's ear.

Only don't discount Mitchie just yet. Rosewood had come to respect Mitchie over the course of them working together and so he eventually invited Mitchie to come work at the lab for him. And Mitchie seems to fit right in with both Pippy and TMI. Who have gotten even happier now that Pippy's longtime friend is no longer trying to split them up.

Though Hornstock was surely playing it fast and loose seeing as he's now dating Villa's mother.

Summary: When a patient of Erica Kincaid's dies on the table, Rosewood steps in to help solve what turns out to be the murder of an undercover ATF agent. But when Villa connects with a cold case detective, it turns out this case has more angles than they ever imagined.

This time it was Rosewood's girlfriend Erica that called him about a dead body. Unfortunately, Erica was on shift at the emergency room when a young woman came in with several stab wounds. And so Erica had tried to save her life though to no avail. The Jane Doe had died on her table and there was not much on her that could offer up any answers as to why she had been targeted much less what her name was.

The victim had been brought in disoriented and she was only able to said one word. She said "Kelly". So no one knew if the name Kelly was her own or that of her killer's, but all the same Erica told Rosewood everything she knew. And he promptly called in Detective Villa for help.

Although, he ended up dropping a particularly hazardous case on his own friend. The victim was later identified as Stephanie Grant. Grant being a career criminal with a mile-long rap sheet and who had an apartment, if such a trash site could even be called that, that was also littered with garbage everywhere. As well as several fake IDs. So Villa that just put more on Villa's plate because she then had to look for a murderer and investigated what Stephanie had been up to prior to her death.

So eventually the case became something more than Villa could handle alone. In time, she came to learn that Stephanie had gotten involved with a gun smuggling ring and to make a bust she had to call in her captain. Which just so happens to be the man she's been trying to ignore because of his relationship with her mother. And yet Villa had to push her feelings on the side because of the case. She needed a fully armed team to bust a gun ring and Rosewood finally got it into his head that he doesn't count when guns are drawn.

Though, while Villa may have cooperated with Captain Hornstock to make a couple of arrests, she hadn't later wanted to turn to him when someone they arrested had asked to speak to him specifically. Villa had merely thought at the time that the suspect was being chauvinistic. So she was actually going to deny his request however that only made him to tell her that he wasn't a crook. He was in fact an undercover ATF Agent.

As well as a good friend of Hornstock who had been the only one he trusted at the station. So Villa did have to bring Hornstock to Agent Dominguez after all. And he was able to get his good friend talking. Agent Dominguez had been undercover for the past couple of months and he said that he and his people were close to making a bust of their own. That would honestly go much further up than the one man by Hornstock and his people.

And so Dominguez wanted to get back to work as soon as possible. Yet, Villa and Hornstock had to ask him about Grant and what her involvement was though they hadn't expected that Dominguez would tell them that she was a cop. Grant whose real name was Tiffany was an ATF agent and she was helping with the investigation in the guns ring. So Villa had asked Dominguez who would have killed her and oddly he had nothing to say.

Dominguez claimed to have no clue as to who would want her dead and even stranger he implied that he was going to keep the operation running despite a dead agent. So Villa had already become suspicious of him when Anita from the Medical Examiner's Office had gotten back to them with autopsy results. Anita told Rosewood and Villa that Tiffany had been killed with an ATF tactical knife. And Hornstock had later noticed that Dominguez was no longer his on him.

Hornstock though had known why Dominguez didn't want to give them information and that's because he knew what it meant to be in charge of the others. It appears that Hornstock had been the only one that suspected Dominguez was keeping quiet not out of necessity, but because he wanted to find Tiffany's killer and deal with him himself. So he ended up reaching out to his friend and told him not to cross that line. He said that if he did then there would be no turning back.

So Hornstock had got Dominguez to trust him and his team to bring Tiffany's killer to justice. However, there was a chance her killer had nothing to do with the gun smuggling case. Villa and Rosewood found Tiffany's hideout and they saw that she had been keeping a notebook on a whole file. That happened to link back to a cold case that over a decade old.

For some reason, Tiffany had reached out to a detective in Cold Cases about a young woman named Kelly Downs. Kelly had disappeared twelve years ago and she had been killed in what looked like a mugging gone wrong. So it hadn't made any sense to either Villa and Rosewood as to why Tiffany would be looking into Kelly's murder until they spoke with the detective on the case and he said that Tiffany claimed to have known something.

Yet, she hadn't told anyone what that something was. So Rosewood and his team had to dig up Kelly and take a second look at the body. Kelly's original autopsy had showed her dead as blunt force trauma however Pippy found evidence of manual strangulation. Which was personal. As if she knew her killer and that the killer was looking at her in her face as he killed her.

And so the guys thought Kelly's death was connected with Tiffany's. But the killer was smart and they tried to destroy the evidence of what they did by breaking into the Medical Examiner's Office and attacking Anita. Rosewood had fortunately come by soon after that so he was able to get Anita the medical attention she needed though the attack had almost cost the cute cold case detective to lose morale.

Frank had thought he had stirred the hornet's nest by looking into Kelly's case again. So he was blaming himself for Tiffany's death as well as the attack on Anita. Though Villa knew that the only thing that could help was for them to finally find their killer so she pushed him till he got back to work. And the three spilt up to go through everyone that Frank had originally questioned for the night Kelly disappeared.

However, Rosewood had figured out who their killer was long before anyone else. He had been canvassing a certain neighborhood when he came across Tiffany's husband. The same husband she had been married to when Kelly died at such a young age. So right away Rosewood had guessed that "Skip" had had an affair with the barely eighteen-year-old Kelly and had killed her when she threatened to tell his wife. And that he later had to kill Tiffany because she began to suspect him of murder.

So Rosewood didn't bother to hide his suspicions. He just came out and accused Skip of everything and then took the other man down after Skip tried to kill him too. And therefore both Kelly and Tiffany were finally able to receive closure. Though back at the lab, things have moved passed being awkward between TMI and Mitchie. Mitchie had made a move on the very gay Tara and he also forgot that Tara is engaged to Rosewood's sister.

Summary: Rosewood's former girlfriend turns his world upside down when she needs his help locating a rich patient who vanished, but the discovery of the man's body kicks off a bizarre murder investigation. Meanwhile, Rosewood struggles to make sense of his complicated relationships with the women in his life.

Rosie was put in a unique position: apparently his girlfriend Erica thought that she and Rosewood were at the stage in their relationship when they should discuss possibly moving in together so she began that conversation by telling him that he would eventually have to move out of his bachelor pad. And, well, Rosewood loves his bachelor pad but couldn't exactly recall asking Erica to move in with him much less agreed to her suggestion. So Rosewood hadn't known what to do about Erica and, just as he was trying to entangle himself from a trap, an ex-girlfriend called him out of the blue.

Dr. Aubrey Joseph it seems had heard about Rosewood's practice and how he's been helping the police department so she called him to ask for his help. Aubrey needed Rosewood's help to find one of her patients. A man by the name of Calvin Spitz who had never missed an appointment with her and would have also called her if he was running late. But Rosewood later had a hard time trying to convince Villa to look up Calvin. Calvin had only been missing for four hours and department policy stated that he had to have been missing for at least twenty-four hours.

Only Aubrey said that she couldn't wait an entire day to find Calvin. She knew her patient very well so she knew that she was one of the few people he trusted and that he would have called her if something happened or if he was experiencing a crisis. However, Villa hadn't thought Calvin was in any danger and so she only went along on a visit to Calvin's house as a way to say that she did something. And it turns out Calvin hadn't even been at home.

Yet, there had been a reason for that. Calvin's body was later found in a pig sty and someone was using the pigs to erase the evidence. Pigs unfortunately eat everything so the pigs had removed several pieces of flesh and bones before their owner had spotted the human remains inside of their pin. And that meant there hadn't been much left by time Calvin's body was handed over to Rosewood. Rosewood though was able to decipher a few things with what little he had. He found out that Calvin hadn't eaten in the last forty-eight hours and that someone had removed both hair follicles as well as Calvin's thumb.

So the missing hair and thumb together with the fact that someone had claimed to be Calvin Spitz at his bank that very morning meant that there was a killer out there impersonating Calvin. And the killer hadn't just targeted Calvin for his money because he had impersonated Calvin more than once. First, the killer had gone to Calvin's bank and had taken out two million dollars however the killer then went on to impersonate Calvin to Calvin's friends and family.

The impersonator had paid a visit to Calvin's ex-wife and had apologized to her for his treatment and then he had followed up that visit by going to see Calvin's daughter. Calvin had a kid a long time ago and he had basically walked out of the little girl's life when she was seven because he didn't think he could be her dad. So that sudden visit from her "dad" had actually surprised Clara. Clara thought her dad had wanted to make amends so the two of them talked for a while and she had been pleasantly surprised that he had remembered how much she loved peaches from when she was little.

However, Villa and Rosewood had been left unnerved after they spoke to Clara. They wanted to know how the killer had known that Clara loved peaches when it wasn't common knowledge that Calvin had a daughter much less abandoned one. And speaking of peaches, the killer had left behind one that he had bitten into. So Rosewood had fished the peach out of the garbage and he tried to detect DNA from it when he found something instead. Rosewood found out that the killer had been wearing a unique set of dentures that had based off of Calvin's real teeth.

And so the killer's obsession was too far gone for any rationality though thankfully someone else had realized that as well.

Dr. Fields was the therapist across the hall from Aubrey and earlier the guys had met him in passing. So Fields had had a chance then to talk to them, but chose not despite his suspicions. Fields it seems had realized he couldn't sit on important information anymore because he had figured out that it had been one of his patients that had killed Calvin so he had called Villa and Rosewood to ask them to meet him at his office. Yet, he had the mistake of trying to forewarn his patient first so he was already dead by time the police arrived at the scene. And without Fields around, Villa and Rosewood had to dig through his client list just to find who they were looking for.

Though what they were looking for someone that felt fed up. Fields's patient had overheard much of Calvin's therapy sessions so he had thought Calvin was mostly whining about life. After all Calvin was rich yet he stole his brother's girlfriend, abandoned his only child, and divorced women the second he got bored. So when Villa and Rosewood finally caught up to their killer, he was in the middle of trying to kill one of Calvin's enemies because he wanted to prove how much better he was than Calvin.

Only SWAT later managed to take down the killer that thought he was invincible. So that should have been an end to a trying day however Erica finally saw the writing on the wall and therefore she broke up with Rosewood because he was in love with Villa.

And as an added bonus, TMI kissed Mitchie and Pippy saw it.

Summary:	Rosewood and Villa may finally be able to reveal their true feelings for each other, but Rosewood's discovery of some interesting evidence leads to his own private investigation without her knowledge. Meanwhile, Rosewood and Pippy make assumptions about Donna's love life; Pippy and TMI's wedding is just around the corner; and Hornstock is haunted by a mistake from his past.

TMI and Pippy had actually talked about that infamous kiss. However, Tara took most of the blame and had told her fiancée that the kiss between her and Mitchie had simply been a mistake. And she also added that it didn't mean anything. So Pippy had taken what Tara said into consideration and she had told Tara that she was fine with what happened, but it didn't appear that she was all that willing to move on.

In the weeks since the kiss happened, Pippy has merely pretended that she's ok with having Mitchie around yet she also always seemed to be there whenever Mitchie tried to talk to Tara. So Pippy wasn't in fact, capable of overlooking what happened and unfortunately Tara refused to see what was going on in the lead up to their wedding. But Mitchie on the other hand could sense that something was still up so he had tried to warn Tara about it in case Tara had to work through a couple of things before she married went ahead with Pippy.

Yet, a few things managed to get in the way before Pippy and Tara could talk things out again. Apparently a junior lawyer at a huge pharmaceutical company had been first drugged and then blown up. Joe Campos had been in and out of foster care his whole life however he decided to make something of himself when he became eighteen. So he went to college, graduated at the top of his class, and eventually became a lawyer at a billion dollar company. And so it hadn't made sense why someone would go out of their way to ensure that he was dead, but that's what happened.

Joe had been given a chemical to stop his heart. So he had already been dead by the time he had either gotten into the car or had been placed there. Though for some reason, someone blew up that car with him in it and that had left his remains scattered all over the place. And yet that didn't necessarily ruin the evidence. Rosewood and his team were still able to perform an autopsy after they technically put Joe back together again and so they found out a lot of things about Joe.

Joe had had a prison tattoo and he must have gotten it while he was in juvie because he was never arrested later on in life. So Villa had gone to the judge that had last put him away and she had asked him if he could remember Joe Campos's case. And luckily for her, he did. The judge could clearly recall a scrawny kid from little Havana that had been running a fake ID scam and he also remembered that Joe used to run around with this one friend in particular that never could stay out of trouble.

And what do you know that friend of his was still trouble. Joe's friend Louie has been in and out of prison through all of his adult life and it turns out that Joe had mostly been the person to bail him out. So Joe had never given up on Louie and the two had remained in close contact right up until Joe was murdered, but Louie wasn't much help for the police nor could he be considered a viable suspect. At least not while he was wearing an ankle bracelet that demanded he not leave the comforts of his own home.

But Villa ended up catching a break with another source. Villa had been looking into what Joe was doing in the days leading up to his murder and she ran into someone that claimed Joe's boss Carla had been in contact. And that had upset Villa because Carla had claimed to barely even know Joe yet it seems that the two had been working on something. That Carla hadn't wanted Andrew Ward to hear about.

Andrew Ward was the owner of Ward Pharmaceuticals and he was also both wealthy and influentially. So when Villa and Rosewood had later taken Andrew up on his offer to attend his office party, Villa had kept Andrew busy while Rosewood used the opportunity to talk to Carla alone. And Carla eventually admitted to Rosewood that she had known Joe was looking into some of Andrew's old cases because he thought it was connected to a corrupt judge. Though the only judge that could cross as corrupt was Judge Walters who was the same man that Villa had spoken with earlier.

Judge Walters had seemed like a good guy and Villa hadn't questioned him all that hard. However, with Carla's information, Villa and Rosewood thought about Joe's last arrest and they wondered why a teenager had been given three years in a correctional facility when all he did was create fake IDs. So they took a look at how the judge could be connected with the judge and they found out that Andrew had started out in real estate. Which included owning a juvenile correctional center.

So that's when it suddenly all made sense. The judge was collecting kickbacks in exchange for keeping the center full with kids and Joe must have found evidence of it if they had gone to additional lengths to ensure he was dead. Yet, nothing had been found on Joe when he died and Carla had also admitted that Joe had hidden the evidence with someone he trusted. And the only person that matched that description was Louie.

Louie who was so out of it that he hadn't even realized that his friend had stashed something at his place. So Villa and Rosewood had to ransack Louie's place themselves to find something, but someone began shooting not long after they found Joe's flash drive. And so both Villa and Rosewood had to fight their way out of Louie's place because the same person that had killed had been sent to stop them.

Only Andrew Ward's plan didn't work. Villa had actually gotten the drop on the hitman and so she was able to take him into custody. Where he was allowed sweat for a while until Rosewood had mentioned finding a cufflink at Joe's crime scene and Hornstock was able to use that to force a confession out of the guy. But usually, Hornstock leaves the questioning to Villa so there had been a reason for why he had taken over with the hitman.

As it turns out the hitman had tried to blackmail Hornstock with something from his past. So Hornstock had to make a decision. He could either get justice for Joe Campos or he could lose everything he had worked for. And by allowing the hitman to go down, Hornstock had made his decision. He chose to do the right thing and hand over his badge himself.

And because of his sacrifice, Hornstock made sure that everyone involved with Joe's death went down. Andrew Ward, the judge, and the man that had carried out all the dirty deeds. Yet, Hornstock's shocking exit wasn't the only thing to happen on tonight's season finale.

Pippy and TMI had had their talk and Pippy had essentially broken things off with Pippy even though their wedding was right around the corner. However, while that may cause some issues at the office because Pippy said she could no longer work with Tara, the real shocker had been what Rosewood did. Rosewood had Mitchie take a second look at Villa's husband Eddie's autopsy and it revealed that Eddie had been murdered. So Rosewood had later tried to tell Villa that though she took what he said as him trying to stop their date.

That's right! They had been close to finally sealing the deal and were just about to become something more with their first official date when Rosewood dropped such news on her. So she believed that the second autopsy had merely been his way of running from something they could have had. And that had upset her so much that she ended up telling him to stay out of her life. As in for good!

The episode opens with a woman named Cassie Hanson leaving a club. She drives to a parking lot, where she sobs before telling herself it'll be okay. The scene fades and we see her body lying at the bottom of the stairs, bleeding out.

At the scene of Cassie's, Beaumont Rosewood and Annalise Villa tell their new captain Ryan Slade that they don't believe it was an accident. He asks if they're comfortable saying that when there will be a media firestorm if word gets out about a murder on campus.

Rosewood and Villa stand by their assessment that it looks like a murder.

Rosewood and Villa look at Cassie's dorm. A woman named Betsy introduces herself and tells them that she lives across the hall. She says she's surprised that Cassie was out since she'd been keeping to herself since her mother passed away.

The team finds out that the bracelet Cassie was wearing the night she was killed was from Saul's Party Bus. When they visit the bus to question the owner, they find him cleaning the bus with bleach.

Saul says that the last people to use the party bus used a fake name and never paid. They show him a picture of Cassie and accuse him of killing her. He says that he remembers her being at the party, but he didn't kill her and he was in the emergency room at the time.

The team finds a new suspect: frat boy Lane Piven. They visit the frat house and Lane's frat brothers distract them while Lane attempts to drive away. But, a car immediately crashes into Lane.

At the precinct, Villa talks to Lane. She accuses him of murdering Cassie and points out that it's telling he tried to escape them. He said he only tried to drive away from the cops because he stiffed the party bus guy.

Villa tells Rosewood that she found out Cassie had an appointment with a reporter who she'd promised an explosive story. She suspects that Cassie was having an affair with the Mayor. Rosewood informs her this theory was wrong— in fact, the Mayor is Cassie's father.

Rosewood tells Captain Slade that he believes the Mayor is Cassie's father, but he needs a look at his torso to be sure. Ira Hornstock volunteers to take the difficult job of interrogating the Mayor.

Ira gets an alibi for the Mayor that checks out. Villa and Rosewood both say they think they know who the killer is, but they need their smoking gun. They have a tech guy enhance an image for them. Rosewood looks at it and says, "There's our killer."

Rosewood and Villa show the Mayor and an aide named James that Cassie's phone took a picture of the killer and that it was him. After he confesses, Rosewood and Villa reveal they didn't really have a smoking gun: they had the tech guy mock up a picture of James so they could claim the phone took it.

At the end of the episode, Villa comes over to Rosewood's. She discovers a bulletin board he has set up with information pertaining to her husband's murder. She gives him a thumb drive and tells him, "That's everything I have so far." She says that she's going to find out who killed Eddie and she thanks Rosewood for doing this. She tells him he can't get up, saying, "I don't know what I'll do when I catch them." He tells her there's no way he can sit this one out. She says, "Let's get to work."

Annalise Villa gets a call from Ryan Slade to go out to a crime scene. She brings Beaumont Rosewood with her. Rosewood realizes the victim, Danny Williams, is an addict who died of an overdose, but he and Villa realize he didn't give himself the injection that killed him.

Villa tells Slade that whoever killed Danny Williams knew about his drug use. Villa also tells him that Ira Hornstock could have come to the same conclusion himself and Slade didn't have to send her.

Villa finds Rosewood and tells him that Danny Williams' real name is Connor Thorn and that Connor already has a death certificate from three years ago. Rosewood says, "Whatever he was running from finally caught up with him."

Villa shows Slade, Rosewood and Hornstock a video of Connor Thorn at a decadent party. Hornstock explains that he faked a suicide when the feds caught onto his financial schemes.

Rosewood checks on Villa to see if she's okay after everything she's learned about her deceased husband Eddie. She cries and says, "I am done. He can solve his own damn murder."

The next day when Donna Rosewood visits, Villa is still at Rosewood's house. She tells her that it's not what she thinks and that she slept on the couch. Donna asks Villa what's bothering her and Villa tells her about Eddie.

Slade questions Troy again. Troy gets very shaky as he tells them that he swears he didn't kill him. As Villa watches, she realizes that Troy knows who did kill Danny.

Villa questions Jenny. She lays out her suspicion that Jenny killed Danny after Troy told her who he really was. But, Hornstock informs them that Jenny had a different motive— her father killed himself after Danny coned him. She waited this long to kill him because she wanted the money and Troy brought her the information that Danny still had it.

At the end of the episode, Rosewood visits the prisoner who Donna has been in contact with. He says, "Explain to me how a serial killer, who gruesomely murdered two innocent women, befriends my mother and convinces her to put it all on the line for him. I'm listening."

At the end of the episode, Villa is back at the office. She remembers a flirtatious conversation she had with her husband where they talked about growing old together. At the end of the flashback, we see Villa smiling fondly at the memory. She notices Rosewood watching her and smiles at him.

Later, Rosewood and his team examine a male victim's body. Mitchie Mendelson and TMI confirm that he was both strangled and drowned. Pippy Rosewood wonders why he was killed. Rosewood shows them a large gem inside the victim's body.

Rosewood shows Ira Hornstock and Captain Ryan Slade the gem and says that he believes the man swallowed it. He explains the man most likely had to hide it quickly and that swallowing it was the only way.

They ID the man as Bree's father Dave. Later, Bree calls them when someone breaks into her home. Rosewood and Villa apprehend him, then Bree recognizes him and calls him Billy.

They take Billy down to the station. Villa wants to question him, but Slade says, "I want first crack at this nut." Slade tells Billy, "Bree told us that you used to treasure hunt with her father. She says that you two had a falling out."

Rosewood and his crew look at Dave's boat. They find blood that doesn't match Dave's and hope it'll lead them to a suspect. Pippy tells them that Hornstock just found out who was funding Dave's expeditions.

Rosewood and Villa tell a man named Cody Tucker that they know he was paying Dave. Cody explains he was paying Dave to cover up the fact that his paid expeditions never actually yield treasure. Villa wonders if he's only admitting to fraud to cover up for killing Dave.

Rosewood, Villa and Hornstock suspect the killer is Edgar Moreno, the gem expert they hired to examine evidence. But, he's already left with the gem they gave him to run tests on.

As they search for Moreno, Rosewood and Villa discuss the fact that the gems belonged to Moreno's family. He'd do anything to protect the treasure and get the gems back.

Villa and a coastal patrol worker named Carl go after Rosewood and Moreno. But, when they arrive Rosewood tells him his new theory. He believes the killer isn't Moreno— it's Carl, who wanted the gem for himself and is now intentionally staying close to the crime to cover his tracks.

Carl demands that Moreno give him the gem and shoots him when he doesn't. Then he turns his gun on Rosewood. Rosewood gives him the gem, but Villa tackles him, handcuffs him and arrests him.

At the end of the episode, Gerald, the prisoner who Donna Rosewood is trying to prove innocent, gets into a fight in prison. He tries to strangle a man who makes a rude comment about Donna and the guards have to pull him away before he really hurts the other man.

Rosewood and Villa supervise the students as they look at a 3-D replica of the victim's body. They believe that Elena was brought to the brink of death repeatedly, then brought back with CPR.

The students ask Rosewood and Villa about Misty, a friend of Elena's. They tell them that they never talked to Misty because she's dead too. One student asks if this was the work of a serial killer. Rosewood says, "I believe we are."

Rosewood and Villa lay out the case against Gerald for the students. This evidence includes a blood stain on Misty's jeans with a partial profile that matches Gerald.

Donna convinces Rosewood to visit Gerald in prison and ask him directly if he was in the woods the night of the girls' murder. When Rosewood asks him, Gerald nods.

Donna tells him, "I believed in you when no one else would. I got my family involved. Why would you hide this from me?" Gerald says that just being in the woods that night makes him seem guilty. Rosewood asks why he was there and he says that he was looking for his daughter Michelle after someone called his tip line and said there was a girl in the woods that looked just like her.

One of Rosewood's students brings his attention to the fact that the DNA report was only a partial match. He suggests that it wasn't Gerald's blood. This leads Rosewood to say, "We've been looking at it all wrong."

Rosewood and Villa tell Donna and Pippy that they did another DNA match and realized it was Gerald's daughter's blood on Elena, that's why it was a partial match.

At the end of the episode, Rosewood visits Gerald again. He tells him that from now all of the Rosewoods are on Team Gerald. He says that he believes Gerald was framed by someone who knew him well and that he's going to bring that person to justice.

Summary:	A food-truck vendor's murder appears to be an open-and-shut case, but there's more than meets the eye when it's discovered that Slade and the victim had a secret connection that goes back years.

The episode opens on two young people at a bonfire. One of them, a boy named Rick Dawson, seems very sick as he hands the other a paper bag. Later in the night, a panicked boy named Ben leads two girls to Rick's body.

Beaumont Rosewood plays video games against his girlfriend's daughter Kayla. His girlfriend Tawnya narrates the game enthusiastically as they play.

At work, Rosewood, Captain Ryan Slade and Annalise Villa question Ben. They realize he suffers from face blindness. Slade despairs at having a witness who can't see faces, but Rosewood points out, "But the victim saw his face."

Villa asks Ben what caused his face blindness. He said that he had a stroke. Rosewood quickly identifies that he also has diabetes and high blood pressure as well.

The detectives find out that Rick cooked for a food truck. They need to narrow down which competing food truck might've fought with Rick. Rosewood suggests they use Ben, saying that just because he can't recognize faces that doesn't mean he can't use his other senses.

Slade, Rosewood and Villa have Ben walk by groups of food trucks. Ben recognizes a voice from the night that Rick died. It's a man named Dwayne. Slade searches Dwayne's food truck and finds drugs.

Villa calls Rosewood and tells him that Rick's truck is on the move. They pull the truck over. When they open the back of the food truck, they see a girl holding a knife.

In questioning, Villa tells the girl that they didn't get a match on the name she gave them. She guesses the girl is undocumented, but assures her that their only interest is identifying the killer. She asks her about her connection to Rick.

Rick's girlfriend tells them about a woman named Simone Kilbor, who Rick recently had dinner with. When Rosewood and Villa find her and bring up Rick's name, she tries to walk.

At the station, Simone asks, "I'm here because of those people who work for me?" Villa angrily tells her, "They're undocumented workers. Human beings." Rosewood accuses her of poisoning Rick with rhubarb leaves. She says she put rhubarb in his curry knowing he was allergic, but she didn't know anything about him being beaten to death.

The team finds the murder weapon and takes Dwayne in. But, later, Rosewood calls Slade and Villa over. He demonstrates how blood spills when you strike someone at a certain angle, then tells them, "We arrested the wrong person."

They bring in Ben again. Villa tells him that she tracked his phone and knows that he was following Rick. They realized he figured out he could blame Dwayne because he had Rick's phone and saw the texts of their fights.

At the end of the episode, the team digs up the coffin for one of the victims in Gerald Kelly's murder case. Rosewood looks inside and is shocked to discover that it's empty.

Hornstock and Villa interrogate Dale. He says that his daughter Tiffany called Ashley and claimed he was hurting their nanny Beth. But, Dale says it was a misunderstanding and that Tiffany caught him being sexual with Beth and thought he was hurting her.

The team returns to the site of Ashley's murder: the home of a woman named Veronica Collins who Ashley was housesitting for. When they find nicotine on the end of the murder weapon and recall that Veronica was a smoker, they develop a theory that she lied about being out of town at all to have an alibi for killing Ashley.

Hornstock questions Veronica. He tells her that he knows she staged the fire that destroyed her business and he suspects that Ashley knew about it, so she killed her.

The team discovers that Ashley's aunt Paula, who is inheriting her trust now that she's dead, is suffering from nicotine poisoning. Rosewood tells her that whoever's next in line for the trust probably killed Ashley and is trying to kill her.

Rosewood and Villa find Ashley's cousin, the next person in line for the trust, and accuse her of Ashley's murder and poisoning Paula. She confesses by telling them that it wasn't just about the money— her mom always loved Ashley more than he loved her. They arrest her.

At the end of the episode, Slade visits Rosewood again. He tells him that he doesn't want to become the kind of person he would be without Rosewood, so it's not Rosewood's life that he's saving by giving him the kidney. Rosewood finally agrees to accept it.

Summary: A double homicide takes Rosewood and Villa to Little Havana to investigate a vigilante, and learn that Villa's brother has a surprising connection to the case. Meanwhile, Rosewood gets news of a complication regarding his kidney transplant.

The episode opens with Captain Ryan Slade briefing the other cops on a vigilante named Santo. He says that Santo doesn't kill anyone or carry a gun. Instead, his weapon of choice is a baton.

Later, Rosewood and Villa look at the body of a man named Dax Honeycutt. And, Villa thinks that Santo killed him, even though he's never killed before. Then, press rushes over to ask her to confirm that she's saying Santo has committed a murder.

Back at Magic City, TMI tells Mitchie Mendelson how much trouble she's having making custom arrangements for Rosewood's hospital room. They both have very specific instructions from Pippy Rosewood.

Later, Rosewood and Villa go over to Dax's place. And, they find a man there who they believe is Santo.

Villa questions the man. And, he says that he was looking for evidence to exonerate Santo.

Then, Rosewood and Viola discover Santo's headquarters. And, they find that his stuff is covered in Dax's fingerprints. So, Dax was Santo.

Rosewood, Villa and Ira Hornstock try to figure out who would want to kill Santo. They know it's not the cartel he was after because at the time of his death they were having a meeting about how to get rid of Santo.

Rosewood shows Villa that the mark on Dax's baton is for an army unit. The mark also matches the one on the baton he was killed with, which means he was killed by someone from his own unit.

Rosewood, Villa and Hornstock tell Slade about a woman named Carly Valesco who had both batons made. She died as a result of the same torture that Dax and the rest of their unit went through.

Rosewood is about to go into surgery. He tells his father Beaumont Rosewood Sr. to order his team to check Dax's nasal passages for calcium carbonate. He believes this will prove who killed Dax.

Marco Villa arranges a meeting with Asa at a paintball court. Ira and Villa surprise him by telling him that they know they killed Dax. They found the paint in his nasal passage and recognized it as paint from Asa's shop.

At the end of the episode, a doctor tells them there's been a complication. Rosewood wakes up okay, but doctors are still tending to Slade. It looks like he's gone into cardiac arrest.

Guest Stars: Dana Ashbrook (Jeff Groves), Diandra Lyle (Sheriff Amy Potts), Alexandra Kyle (Sandy Langford), Scott Michael Campbell (Earl Langford), Nicole Lynn Evans (Beverly)
Summary: Rosewood struggles with guilt when Slade faces complications following his kidney donation. Meanwhile, Rosewood, Villa and TMI head to a small town to investigate the murder of its former mayor.

The episode opens with a man named Mayor Orson Delmar riding a tractor in Marshwood, Florida. Later, it's revealed that he's dead and trapped underneath the tractor.

Rosewood, Annalise Villa and TMI travel to Marshwood. Along with Sheriff Amy Potts, they investigate the crime scene. Rosewood says that Orson was dead before he ended up under the tractor, meaning this wasn't an accident—it was a murder.

Mitchie Mendelson and Pippy Rosewood report from Magic City that they believe there was poison in Orson's body. Meanwhile, Rosewood and the others search Orsons' house for anything that could be used to poison him.

The team finds out that Orson was sleeping with a married woman named Sandy Langford. They find Sandy's husband Earl. He has a gun, but TMI distracts him while Villa enters his house from the back to hold a gun on him.

In jail, Earl asks for Jeff Groves, the town's only lawyer. Rosewood and Villa accuse him of overprescribing Orson with testosterone in order to kill him. Earl says that if he was going to kill Orson, he'd shoot him. But, Mitchie contacts them and says that there's no sign of that being the cause of death.

Once they team identifies the type of poison that killed Orson, Amy suggests testing everyone in town since it's not that big. Pippy discovers that everyone in town is testing positive for the poison. Then, they're interrupted with a call about Slade's status in the hospital.

Rosewood tells Villa that Slade's immune system isn't responding to any antibiotics. He says that until the doctors can find the right combination, it's not looking good for him.

When the team finds a cup that they believe was used to poison Orson at Sandy's house, they arrest her. But, while she's in her jail cell she collapses and goes into cardiac arrest.

Rosewood rushes her into the team's makeshift lab and they scramble to save her. They're able to resuscitate her. Sandy asks what happened. Villa says that the person who killed Orson just tried to kill her too.

Sandy tells them that Jeff Groves was blackmailing her and Orson. They had to pay him off so he wouldn't tell Earl about their affair. The team arrests Groves, believing he tried to kill them.

But, Mitchie and Pippy arrive with the cup that was used to poison Orson. They've tested it for fingerprints. Rosewood sees that Groves didn't do it.

Rosewood brings Sandy back into the lab. He tells her he has to give her an ultrasound to make sure she won't have organ failure from being poisoned. He reveals he knows that she poisoned herself because they were too close to suspecting her. Amy arrests her for Orson's murder again.

At the end of the episode, Rosewood and Villa return to the hospital and ask Ira Hornstock how Slade is. Hornstock tells them it's going to be okay.

Summary: The death of a school teacher pulls Rosewood and Villa into the world of human trafficking, while a surprising insight into Slade's past draws them closer than ever before.

The episode opens with Villa having a stress dream. She imagines being at a shooting range and shooting her brother Marcos Villa.

Later, Ira Hornstock brings Rosewood and Villa footage that shows Ryan Slade was with Tanny, a dead school teacher and former sex worker hours before she was murdered. So, Rosewood recalls that Slade showed up at the crime scene and handled the body without gloves, which could've been a cover up so they wouldn't flag his fingerprints.

Later, Hornstock and Villa speculate about whether Slade was picking up Tanny. But, Hornstock says they have to give him the benefit of the doubt.

Then, Rosewood and Villa question a sex worker named Kitty. They show her a picture of Slade and asks if she knows him. And, she says that about ten years ago he was her best customer and that he's a dangerous man.

Kitty says that everyone was terrified of Slade. She adds that he was especially scary to Tanny.

Rosewood poses as someone looking for an escort and meets Jaclyn. He and Villa sneak Rosewood away from where her pimp is holding her.

They bring Jaclyn back to Villa's house. She points to a picture of Slade on the wall and says that she's seen him before.

Villa talks to Captain Marino, Slade's former captain. She tells him they believe Slade might be connected to a human trafficking ring. She asks Marino if he's willing to work with them. He says, "I'm willing to do anything you need, including taking down one of our own."

Hornstock visits Slade's boat to give him a chance to explain himself. Then, he walks into Magic City. When Villa asks him what happened with Slade, Hornstock says, "It's time."

Slade meets with Marino. Slade says that Marino put him in undercover as a john. Villa, Rosewood and Hornstock come out of hiding and say that they know the truth.

But, Slade says that Marino put him in undercover, then took over the human trafficking ring after they shut it down. Rosewood, Villa and Hornstock explain that Slade told them everything and that this sting wasn't for Slade, it was for Marino.

At the end of the episode, Marcos comes to the precinct and confronts Rosewood about sending a doctor to check on him. They end up in a fight, which Villa walks in on.

Summary: A highly skilled group of criminals are the prime suspects in a jewelry store heist. Meanwhile, Rosewood thinks someone from his inner circle should run a new Magic City Lab on the west coast.

The episode opens on a montage. Beaumont Rosewood looks in his bathroom mirror. Meanwhile, Marcos Villa showers.

Later, Rosewood calls in the team because of a body left out in public. It turns out, the body was stolen from a mortuary. Annalise Villa realizes that whoever placed it was just trying to create a diversion. She starts evacuating the streets before spotting a masked criminal.

Villa catches up Ryan Slade. She explains that burglars placed a body to distract from a jewelry heist.

Later, Mitchie Mendelson tells Rosewood that they have a match on dandruff found at the scene. Villa and Ira Hornstock tell Rosewood the suspect's name is Benji Tovar. But, when they arrive at Benji's apartment, they only find a body.

Villa and Hornstock see that his gunshot wound was at close range. They believe one of his teammates shot him.

Villa, Rosewood and Hornstock go to an abandoned mall that they suspect the burglars were working out of. They set off a motion alert and Villa realizes they're being watched. A man named Wayne tries to drive away, but police surround him and shoot at his car until it crashes and he steps out. His car explodes behind him.

Wayne says that Benji offered him $1,000 a day to build a replica of the jewelry store and he thought it was weird, but he needed the money. Hornstock tells him that if he doesn't give them what they need to find the guy behind the heist, he'll put him away.

Villa realizes a heist is going down at the store where one jewelry moved all his diamonds. She arrives at the scene as the burglars are getting away. She stops their car and points her gun at them, asking them to surrender the vehicle. But, one man raises his gun and shoots at her.

The vehicle tries to get away, but cop cars and helicopters surround it. The burglars step out and start shooting their machine guns.

Villa goes after one of the burglars. But, when she finds him she sees that it's Marcos. He tells her he's sorry.

She asks how he could do this. He says that he gave the last eight years to this country and they threw him away like trash. When he refuses to put his weapon down, she gives him instructions for how to get away. However, once he's gone, she puts in a call telling other police exactly what road he'll be taking.

At the end of the episode, Villa tells Rosewood that Adrian got a job in L.A. She's leaving with him. However, before she leaves, she tells Rosewood, "Say something that'll make me stay." After a minute, he says, "Annalise." She turns around to face him. Before, he can continue speaking, the episode ends.
